D. "VOLUNTARY EXPORT RESTRAINTS" AND GREY-AREA MEASURES

During the discussion in the Council in March 1978 concerning the EEC's invocation of Article XIX with respect to the imposition of import restrictions on monochrome television sets imported into the United Kingdom from Korea, the Korean representative stated that these restrictions were imposed in violation of the relevant provisions of the GATT, and "expressed concern that acquiescence on the part of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in this case might be utilized as a precedent for legitimizing selective import restrictions in the conduct of international trade". The Hong Kong delegation "emphasized that Article XIX was not susceptible of being invoked on a discriminatory basis. He referred to [discussions during the Havana Conference and in 1953, noted above at page 519 and following] ... The only derogation from this principle of non-discrimination was in the Textiles Arrangements, which would not have been necessary if Article XIX had been capable of being used in a selective manner. ... A large number of representatives also spoke on the matter and expressed the opinion that Article XIX did not provide for the discriminatory application of measures to limit potentially disruptive imports". It was also stated that "voluntary restraint agreements were often forced upon the weaker members of the GATT ... there was no provision in the General Agreement that provided a legal basis for discriminatory restraints, even when they were supported by an agreement of a voluntary nature".⁸⁵

A Note by the Director-General on "Safeguards", which is annexed to the 1984 Report on "Safeguards" by the Chairman of the Council to the Fortieth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, notes as follows:

"Export restrictions are generally prohibited under Article XI unless covered by an exception. Measures limiting exports to certain contracting parties only are, in any case, contrary to the provisions of Article XIII (except in the exceptional situations laid down in Article XIV) which provides for the non-discriminatory application of such restrictions. It may be argued that this is a very legalistic way of looking at the matter and that 'voluntary export restraints' are not, in fact, export restrictions but import restrictions which are administered by the exporting country. They would, once again, only be in conformity with the General Agreement if they were justified under a particular exception to Article XI and administered in accordance with the provisions relating to the non-discriminatory administration of quantitative restrictions contained in Article XIII. In fact 'voluntary' export restraints are clearly contrary to the present rules of the General Agreement and are only 'outside the General Agreement' in the sense that governments have not brought them formally to the GATT for examination".⁸⁶

Grey-area measures have been examined by panels under Article XXIII on a number of occasions. In 1980, the Panel on "EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Apples from Chile" examined a suspension by the EEC of imports of apples from Chile, after arrangements were reached with four other Southern Hemisphere suppliers for the restraint of their exports of apples to the EEC. In its findings,

"The Panel examined the EEC measure in relation to Article XIII:1. The Panel found that the EEC suspension applied to imports from Chile was not a restriction similar to the voluntary restraint agreements negotiated with the other Southern Hemisphere suppliers on the basis primarily that:

- "(a) there was a difference in transparency between the two types of action;
- "(b) there was a difference in the administration of the restrictions, the one being an import restriction, the other an export restraint; and
- "(c) the import suspension was unilateral and mandatory while the other was voluntary and negotiated.

⁸⁶MDF/4, p. 6, para. 11; MDF/4 appears at 31S/136 but the Annex is not reproduced.

“... Notwithstanding the Panel’s conclusions regarding the lack of similarity of the restrictions with regard to Article XIII:1, and in light of XIII:5, the Panel proceeded to consider the EEC import suspension against Chile and the voluntary restraint agreements with other Southern Hemisphere exporters as ‘quotas’ for purposes of the Panel’s examination of the EEC measure under XIII:2”.⁸⁷

In 1989, the Panel on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile” examined a later suspension by the EEC of imports of apples from Chile. With regard to Article XIII:2 and :4, “...the Panel did not find any basis in the General Agreement for the EC taking into account as ‘special factors’ the restraint alleged to have been exercised in previous years by other suppliers”.⁸⁸

See also the 1988 Report of the Panel on “Japan - Trade in Semi-conductors”, which examined, inter alia, a third-country market monitoring scheme established by Japan after the 1985 Arrangement with the United States concerning Trade in Semiconductors. In its findings,

“The Panel examined the parties’ contentions in the light of Article XI:1. ... The Panel noted that this wording [of Article XI:1] was comprehensive: it applied to all measures instituted or maintained by a contracting party prohibiting or restricting the importation, exportation or sale for export of products other than measures that take the form of duties, taxes or other charges.

“The Panel noted that the CONTRACTING PARTIES had decided in a previous case that the import regulation allowing the import of a product in principle, but not below a minimum price level, constituted a restriction on importation within the meaning of Article XI:1 (BISD 25S/99). The Panel considered that the principle applied in that case to restrictions on imports of goods below certain prices was equally applicable to restrictions on exports below certain prices.

“The Panel then examined the contention of the Japanese Government that the measures complained of were not restrictions within the meaning of Article XI:1 because they were not legally binding or mandatory. In this respect the Panel noted that Article XI:1, unlike other provisions of the General Agreement, did not refer to laws or regulations but more broadly to measures. This wording indicated clearly that any measure instituted or maintained by a contracting party which restricted the exportation or sale for export of products was covered by this provision, irrespective of the legal status of the measure”.⁸⁹

“... The Panel concluded that the complex of measures constituted a coherent system restricting the sale for export of monitored semi-conductors at prices below company-specific costs to markets other than the United States, inconsistent with Article XI.1”.⁹⁰

With regard to the possibility of using dispute settlement proceedings under the General Agreement to enforce agreements between contracting parties providing for “voluntary export restraints”, it may be noted that a Decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provides that “The determination of rights and obligations between governments arising under a bilateral agreement is not a matter within the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES”. A footnote to this decision provides that “This Decision by its terms clearly refers only to the determination of the rights and obligations as between the parties to the bilateral agreement and arising from it. It is, however, within the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to determine whether action under such a bilateral agreement would or would not conflict with the provisions of the General Agreement”.⁹¹

E. WORK UNDERTAKEN IN THE GATT ON SAFEGUARDS

A Secretariat Note of 1987 on “Work Already Undertaken in the GATT on Safeguards” describes the history of discussions on safeguards as follows:

At the time that Japan’s accession to the GATT was under discussion in February 1953, some contracting parties wished to retain the right to apply discriminatory quantitative restrictions on imports from Japan.⁹³ They suggested that an additional safeguard clause should be introduced into the General Agreement, arguing that a large number of Article XIX actions, which would have to be applied on a most-favoured-nation basis, might lead to a general raising of barriers to world trade. Other contracting parties felt that no additional safeguard clause was required. A suggestion was made that in order to avoid a higher general level of barriers to world trade, contracting parties might bring cases to the GATT under Article XXIII, paragraph 2, under which the CONTRACTING PARTIES could authorize the application of safeguard actions on a discriminatory basis. However, some delegations pointed out that there might be circumstances in which the procedures of Article XXIII would be too slow in operation to provide adequate safeguards, and they suggested that if the CONTRACTING PARTIES failed to reach a decision within thirty days, provisional safeguard measures might be taken pending a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. In the end there was no agreement on the application of Article XXIII along these lines.

Japan became a contracting party in September 1955 without any new general safeguard clause being added to the General Agreement. Some contracting parties invoked Article XXXV on Japan’s accession. In a number of cases, Japan negotiated bilateral trade agreements containing special safeguard clauses and then the countries concerned disinvoked Article XXXV. Some countries did not invoke Article XXXV but nevertheless continued to discriminate against Japan.⁹⁴

At the November 1959 Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, some delegations stated that sharp increases in imports, over a brief period of time and in a narrow range of commodities, could have serious economic, political and social repercussions in the importing countries. The CONTRACTING PARTIES accordingly decided that the secretariat should prepare a factual study on the question of “market disruption”.⁹⁵ The outcome of the study showed that a wide variety of products, chiefly textiles and clothing products, were subject to import restrictions applied by a number of countries to deal with market disruption.⁹⁶ In June 1960 a Working Party on “Avoidance of Market Disruption” was established. In November 1960, a Decision was adopted recognizing that “(a) In a number of countries situations occur or threaten to occur which have been described as ‘market disruption’.

⁹²Spec(82)18 dated 26 March 1982; Spec(82)18/Rev.3 dated 22 May 1984; L/6087, dated 28 November 1986; Secretariat Note on “Inventory of Article XIX Actions and Other Measures which Appear to Serve the Same Purpose”, MTN.GNG/NG9/W/2/Rev.1, dated 17 August 1987, and Corr.1 dated 31 August 1987; Background Note by the Secretariat on “‘Grey-Area’ Measures” dated 16 September 1987, MTN.GNG/NG9/W/6. “(i) a sharp and substantial increase or potential increase of imports of particular products from particular sources;

“(ii) these products are offered at prices which are substantially below those prevailing for similar goods of comparable quality in the market of the importing country;

“(iii) there is serious damage to domestic producers or threat thereof;

“(iv) the price differentials referred to in paragraph (ii) above do not arise from governmental intervention in the fixing or formation of prices or from dumping practices. ...

“(c) These situations have often led governments to take a variety of exceptional measures. In some cases importing countries have taken or maintained discriminatory measures either outside the framework of the General Agreement, or contrary to the provisions of the General Agreement. In some other cases exporting countries have tried to correct the situation by taking measures to limit or control the export of the products giving rise to the situation.

“(d) Such measures, taken unilaterally or through bilateral arrangement, may in some cases tend to cause difficulties in other markets and create problems for other contracting parties”.⁹⁷

The same Decision provided for a programme of work. This work did not lead to the elaboration of any generally applicable solutions, however,⁹⁸ but indirectly to the negotiation of a special safeguard clause relating to a single industrial sector – cotton textiles.

The Short-Term Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Cotton Textiles (STA)⁹⁹ came into force on 1 October 1961 for a twelve-month period pending a long-term solution. A year later, the STA was superseded by the Long-Term Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Cotton Textiles (LTA)¹⁰⁰ which came into force on 1 October 1962 for a five-year period and continued into force until 31 December 1973. The stated objectives of the LTA, as of the STA, were two-fold: to promote the economic progress of developing countries by providing larger opportunities for exchange earnings, while ensuring that cotton textiles trade developed in such a way as to avoid disruptive effects in individual markets. Later, the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles, commonly known as the Multifibre Arrangement or the MFA,¹⁰¹ covering textile products of man-made fibre and wool as well as cotton, entered into force on 1 January 1974 for a period of four years. As noted above on page 531, the MFA was extended a number of times and finally expired at the end of 1994.

The Tokyo Declaration adopted in September 1973, which launched the Tokyo Round of multilateral trade negotiations, stated that these negotiations should aim, inter alia, to “include an examination of the adequacy of the multilateral safeguard system, considering particularly the modalities of application of Article XIX, with a view to furthering trade liberalization and preserving its results”.¹⁰² The Trade Negotiations Committee established a negotiating group on safeguards in February 1975 to carry out the task set out in the Ministerial mandate. However, in spite of intensive efforts made in the final stage of the Tokyo Round, and a narrowing of differences, it did not prove possible to reach agreement within the framework of the Round.¹⁰³

In the “GATT Work Programme” agreed on 29 November 1979 to follow up on the Tokyo Round results, it was agreed that “Continued negotiations on safeguards constitute an essential element in the GATT

⁹⁸In May 1964, after two years of experience with the LTA and at the time when the Kennedy Round was under preparation, the Executive Secretary of GATT made some unofficial “preliminary suggestions” (see above, page 520) which were rejected and not pursued.

Work Programme and should be carried out as a matter of urgency in accordance with the agreement reached in the Council on this matter".¹⁰⁴ The separate Decision on "Safeguards" of the same date provided that "The CONTRACTING PARTIES stress the need for an agreement on an improved multilateral safeguard system. The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirm their intention to continue to abide by the disciplines and obligations of Article XIX of the General Agreement. A Committee is established to continue discussions and negotiations ... with the aim of elaborating supplementary rules and procedures regarding the application of Article XIX of the General Agreement, in order to provide greater uniformity and certainty in the implementation of its provisions".¹⁰⁵ At the same time it was decided to establish the Sub-Committee on Protective Measures of the Committee on Trade and Development.¹⁰⁶

At its meeting in April 1981, the Committee on Safeguards adopted the following conclusions:

- "(i) the provisions of Article XIX of the General Agreement continue to apply fully and at the present time the rules and procedures for their application remain unchanged;
- "(ii) the CONTRACTING PARTIES will continue to keep the matter under examination and discussion and to this end the Committee on Safeguards will expedite its work;
- "(iii) All actions taken under Article XIX, and to the extent possible, other actions which serve the same purpose will be notified to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. In addition, it will be open to contracting parties to bring up any matter in accordance with the Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance.¹⁰⁷

In November 1982, the CONTRACTING PARTIES meeting at Ministerial level adopted a Ministerial Declaration, paragraph 7(vi) of which provided that "the contracting parties undertake, individually and jointly ... to bring into effect expeditiously a comprehensive understanding on safeguards to be based on the principles of the General Agreement".¹⁰⁸ The Decision adopted on the same date on "Safeguards" provides:

"The CONTRACTING PARTIES decide:

"1. That, having regard to the objectives and disciplines of the General Agreement, there is need for an improved and more efficient safeguard system which provides for greater predictability and clarity and also greater security and equity for both importing and exporting countries, so as to preserve the results of trade liberalization and avoid the proliferation of restrictive measures; and

"2. That to this end, effect should be given to a comprehensive understanding to be based on the principles of the General Agreement which would contain, inter alia, the following elements:

- "(i) Transparency;
- "(ii) Coverage;
- "(iii) Objective criteria for action including the concept of serious injury or threat thereof;
- "(iv) Temporary nature, degressivity and structural adjustment;
- "(v) Compensation and retaliation; and
- "(vi) Notification, consultation, multilateral surveillance and dispute settlement with particular reference to the role and functions of the Safeguards Committee".

¹⁰⁸L/5424, Ministerial Declaration adopted on 29 November 1982, 29S/9, 12, para. 7(vi).

The Ministerial Declaration of 20 September 1986 launching the Uruguay Round provided that

“A comprehensive agreement on safeguards is of particular importance to the strengthening of the GATT system and to progress in the Multilateral Trade Negotiations.

“The agreement on safeguards:

- “– shall be based on the basic principles of the General Agreement;
- “– shall contain, inter alia, the following elements: transparency, coverage, objective criteria for action including the concept of serious injury or threat thereof, temporary nature, degressivity and structural adjustment, compensation and retaliation, notification, consultation, multilateral surveillance and dispute settlement; and
- “– shall clarify and reinforce the disciplines of the General Agreement and should apply to all contracting parties”.¹⁰⁹

The WTO Agreement includes an Agreement on Safeguards, which includes provisions on conditions for application of safeguards measures (“those measures provided for in Article XIX of GATT 1994”), determination of serious injury or threat thereof, application of safeguard measures, provisional safeguard measures, duration and review of safeguard measures, level of concessions and other obligations, developing country WTO members, termination of pre-existing Article XIX measures, and prohibition and elimination of grey-area measures. The Agreement also provides for notification, consultation, dispute settlement and surveillance of measures in this area.

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

The Havana Charter provision corresponding to Article XIX is Article 40; in the US Draft, Article 29; in the London and New York Drafts, Article 34; and in the Geneva Draft, Article 40. Concerning the antecedents of the “escape clause” in the US Draft Charter, see page 518 above.

Article XIX has been amended only once. In the Review Session of 1954-55, it was agreed to change the term “obligations or concessions” (paragraph 3(a) and (b)) to “concessions or other obligations”.¹¹⁰ This change was effected through the 1955 Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, and came into force in October 1957. Various other amendments to Article XIX were proposed in the Review Session but rejected.¹¹¹

V. NOTIFICATIONS TO THE SECRETARIAT OF ACTIONS UNDER ARTICLE XIX

(Situation as at 1 January 1995)

General notes:

- (1) The only actions listed are those which have been notified under Article XIX. This table does not include other quantitative restrictions or "emergency actions" notified without reference to Article XIX.
- (2) Product descriptions are abbreviated.
- (3) Column on affected countries is based on claimed interest or on information on principal or substantial suppliers furnished by governments taking actions, and may therefore be incomplete. In some instances, these statistics indicate largest suppliers.
- (4) Shaded table cells indicate that the Article XIX action had not been terminated as of 1 January 1995.

18.	1.4.59	20.5.60 (new tariffs introduced)	Australia	Footwear	Import licensing issued to the extent of 100% of imports during financial year 1956-57. All footwear transferred from licensing categ. B (under which quotas were interchangeable among a wide variety of goods) to categ. A (under which quotas were related to particular goods), to reduce substantially only rate of import of casual footwear. Background was marked increase in licences issued for imports from Hong Kong and other sources after Japan agreed Dec. 1958 to export restraints on casual footwear. Action modified 1 August 1959 (for some items 100% of 1957-58 imports, for some items 75%, for another 50%).	Japan, Hong Kong	L/974 & Add.1-2
19.	1.11.59	11.10.67	US	Stainless steel flatware	Various compound duties replaced by increased ad valorem duties or compound duties depending on the article, for imports valued under certain price when imported in excess of a tariff quota. In 3.1958 President had decided that "a full evaluation of Japan's voluntary export limitation system was necessary because of the promise it held of relieving the situation ... In July 1959 after a supplemental investigation another report was submitted. It is on the basis of this entire investigation and history that the action ... is taken" (L/1076). On 7.1.66, quotas increased and over-quota rates reduced retroactive to 1.11.65.	Japan	L/791, L/1076 & Add.1, AIR/177, L/2543, L/2953 See also item 62.

72.	1.1.76	31.8.78	Canada	Worsted spun acrylic yarns below a certain price	Global quota for products under a certain export price (determined in accordance with the Anti-Dumping Act). Permits already issued for Jan - June 1976 delivery were honoured and included as part of quota; distribution of import permits was based on historical performance of importer over two years ending 31.3.76. 10% of quota allotted to importers without historical performance in this period. Gradually phased out as from 30 June 1978.	Japan, Korea	L/4344 & Add.1-2
73.	1.5.76	1.1.82 (Partial removal 22.11.77)	Australia	Sand boots and shoes; parts of footwear	Included within scope of restrictions under item 66. Footwear already subject to licensing maintained at 140% of 1972-73 volume. Sand boots/shoes incorporated into non-leather footwear licensing category (quota for which was consequently increased). This additional quota allocated to individual importers after account taken of goods in bond and in transit as at 7.5.76; base period for this allocation widened to include imports 1.7.74-31.12.75, and quotas thus allocated could be used to import sand shoes/boots and other non-leather footwear (quota available for non-leather footwear could also be used for sand shoes/boots). Licensing controls on imports of parts for footwear restricted annual import value to 140% of 1973-74. Allocations to individual importers made on basis of 1973-74 imports after account taken of goods in bond and in transit. High-priced footwear exempted from import licensing on 22.11.77.	Sand boots and shoes: Korea. Parts: Germany, Italy, Portugal	L/4099/Add.3 and 6, Add. 16, Add.23. See also items 66 and 89.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XX AND INTERPRETATIVE NOTE AD ARTICLE XXArticle XXGeneral Exceptions

Subject to the requirement that such measures are not applied in a manner which would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination between countries where the same conditions prevail, or a disguised restriction on international trade, nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to prevent the adoption or enforcement by any contracting party of measures:

- (a) necessary to protect public morals;
- (b) necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health;
- (c) relating to the importations or exportations of gold or silver;
- (d) necessary to secure compliance with laws or regulations which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Agreement, including those relating to customs enforcement, the enforcement of monopolies operated under paragraph 4 of Article II and Article XVII, the protection of patents, trade marks and copyrights, and the prevention of deceptive practices;
- (e) relating to the products of prison labour;
- (f) imposed for the protection of national treasures of artistic, historic or archaeological value;
- (g) relating to the conservation of exhaustible natural resources if such measures are made effective in conjunction with restrictions on domestic production or consumption;
- (h) undertaken in pursuance of obligations under any intergovernmental commodity agreement which conforms to criteria submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES and not disapproved by them or which is itself so submitted and not so disapproved;*
- (i) involving restrictions on exports of domestic materials necessary to ensure essential quantities of such materials to a domestic processing industry during periods when the domestic price of such materials is held below the world price as part of a governmental stabilization plan; Provided that such restrictions shall not operate to increase the exports of or the protection afforded to such domestic industry, and shall not depart from the provisions of this Agreement relating to non-discrimination;
- (j) essential to the acquisition or distribution of products in general or local short supply; Provided that any such measures shall be consistent with the principle that all contracting parties are entitled to an equitable share of the international supply of such products, and that any such measures, which are inconsistent with the other provisions of the Agreement shall be discontinued as soon as the conditions giving rise to them have ceased to exist. The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall review the need for this sub-paragraph not later than 30 June 1960.

Interpretative Note Ad Article XX from Annex I

Sub-paragraph (h)

The exception provided for in this sub-paragraph extends to any commodity agreement which conforms to the principles approved by the Economic and Social Council in its resolution 30 (IV) of 28 March 1947.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XX

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XX

1. General

The 1984 Panel Report on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act” notes, with regard to the argument that certain measures fell within Article XX(d):

“Since Article XX(d) is an exception to the General Agreement it is up to Canada, as the party invoking the exception, to demonstrate that the purchase undertakings are necessary to secure compliance with the Foreign Investment Review Act”.¹

The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” found that “... it is up to the contracting party seeking to justify measures under Article XX(d) to demonstrate that those measures are ‘necessary’ within the meaning of that provision”.²

The 1991 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna”, which has not been adopted, includes the following finding regarding the presentation of arguments to a panel concerning both the positive prescriptions of the General Agreement and the exceptions in Article XX:

“The Panel noted that the United States had argued that its direct embargo under the MMPA could be justified under Article XX(b) or Article XX(g), and that Mexico had argued that a contracting party could not simultaneously argue that a measure is compatible with the general rules of the General Agreement and invoke Article XX for that measure. The Panel recalled that previous panels had established that Article XX is a limited and conditional exception from obligations under other provisions of the General Agreement, and not a positive rule establishing obligations in itself.³ Therefore, the practice of panels has been to interpret Article XX narrowly, to place the burden on the party invoking Article XX to justify its invocation,⁴ and not to examine Article XX exceptions unless invoked.⁵ Nevertheless, the Panel considered that a party to a dispute could argue in the alternative that Article XX might apply, without this argument constituting ipso facto an admission that the measures in question would otherwise be inconsistent with the General Agreement. Indeed, the efficient operation of the dispute settlement process required that such arguments in the alternative be possible”.⁶

2. Preamble of Article XX

The preamble was inserted into the exceptions article of the commercial policy chapter of the draft ITO Charter during the London session of the Preparatory Committee. At that time one delegation stated that “Indirect protection is an undesirable and dangerous phenomenon. ... Many times the stipulations ‘to protect animal or plant life or health’ are misused for indirect protection. It is recommended to insert a clause which prohibits expressly [the use of] such measures [to] constitute an indirect protection ...”.⁷ In discussions in the Technical Sub-committee of Committee II at London, the following proposal was made.

⁷EPCT/C.II/32 (Note of the Netherlands and the Belgo-Luxembourg Economic Union, 30 October 1946).

“... it had been the practice in international agreements to include such exceptions as those laid down in Article 32 [XX], but only exceptions to provisions on import prohibitions and restrictions. The exceptions of Article 32 [XX] covered a far wider field.

“In order to prevent abuse of the exceptions of Article 32 ... the following sentence should be inserted as an introduction: ‘The undertakings in Chapter IV of this Charter relating to import and export restrictions shall not be construed to prevent the adoption or enforcement by any Member of the following measures, provided that they are not applied in such a manner as to constitute a means of arbitrary discrimination between countries where the same conditions prevail, or a disguised restriction on international trade’.”⁸

This suggestion was generally accepted subject to later review of its wording, particularly as to whether the scope of the Article should be limited to import and export restrictions.⁹ See also Article XX(b) below.

(1) “arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination between countries where the same conditions prevail”

In the 1982 Panel Report on “United States - Prohibition of Imports of Tuna and Tuna Products from Canada”, the Panel examined a US prohibition on imports of tuna and tuna products from Canada, imposed 31 August 1979 following the seizure by Canadian authorities of US fishing vessels and fishermen in disputed waters.

“The Panel noted the preamble to Article XX. The United States’ action of 31 August 1979 had been taken exclusively against imports of tuna and tuna products from Canada, but similar actions had been taken against imports from Costa Rica, Ecuador, Mexico and Peru and then for similar reasons. The Panel felt that the discrimination of Canada in this case might not necessarily have been arbitrary or unjustifiable. ...”¹⁰

The 1983 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies” examined a ban on imports, under an “exclusion order” of the U.S. International Trade Commission, of certain automotive spring assemblies which the Commission had found under Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 infringed United States patents. The Panel decided to first examine the applicability of Article XX(d).

“Looking first at the Preamble, the Panel interpreted the word ‘measure’ to mean the exclusion order issued by the United States International Trade Commission (ITC) under the provisions and procedures of Section 337 since, in the view of the Panel, it was the exclusion order which operated as the measure preventing the importation of the infringing product.

“The Panel noted that the exclusion order was directed against imports of certain automotive spring assemblies produced in violation of a valid United States patent from all foreign sources, and not just from Canada. It found, therefore, that the exclusion order was ‘not applied in a manner which would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination against countries where the same conditions prevail’.”¹¹

The Panel Report was adopted “on the understanding that this shall not foreclose future examination of the use of Section 337 to deal with patent infringement cases from the point of view of consistency with Articles III and XX of the General Agreement”.¹² Such examination took place during the panel proceedings on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930”.

(2) “disguised restriction on international trade”

The 1982 Panel Report on “United States - Prohibition of Imports of Tuna and Tuna Products from Canada” notes that the Panel “felt that the United States’ action should not be considered to be a disguised restriction on international trade, noting that the United States’ prohibition of imports of tuna and tuna products from Canada had been taken as a trade measure and publicly announced as such”.¹³ In discussions on this report at the 22 February 1982 Council meeting, the representative of Canada noted that “Canada did not consider it sufficient for a trade measure to be publicly announced as such for it to be considered not to be a disguised restriction on international trade within the meaning of Article XX of the General Agreement”.¹⁴

The 1983 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies” also notes that

“The Panel ... considered whether or not the exclusion order was ‘applied in a manner which would constitute ... a disguised restriction on international trade’. The Panel noted that the Preamble of Article XX made it clear that it was the application of the measure and not the measure itself that needed to be examined. Notice of the exclusion order was published in the Federal Register and the order was enforced by the United States Customs at the border. The Panel also noted that the ITC proceedings in this particular case were directed against the importation of automotive spring assemblies produced in violation of a valid United States patent and that, before an exclusion order could be issued under Section 337, both the validity of a patent and its infringement by a foreign manufacturer had to be clearly established. Furthermore, the exclusion order would not prohibit the importation of automotive spring assemblies produced by any producer outside the United States who had a licence from Kuhlman Corporation (Kuhlman) to produce these goods. Consequently, the Panel found that the exclusion order had not been applied in a manner which constituted a disguised restriction on international trade”.¹⁵

3. Paragraph (b)

(1) “necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health”

During the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, in discussions concerning paragraph (b) and its relationship to the preamble of this article, it was agreed to delete the phrase (which had appeared in the New York draft of paragraph (b)) “if corresponding domestic safeguards under similar conditions exist in the importing country”. The reasons for the proposed deletion were that this would be difficult to implement, and “as for the protection needed for exporting countries, to see that this is not abused ... that is afforded one by the headnote to the Article ...”.¹⁶ It was stated at that time that “in view of the misuses which have been made in the past of sanitary regulations, and of damages caused in this way to exporting countries, it would be regrettable if we were to renounce any clarification of the provisions of sub-paragraph (b). However, the discussion which was raised here shows clearly that this Committee is against any possibility of this provision being used as a measure of protection in disguise”.¹⁷

The record of the discussions at the Havana Conference in the Third Committee on the corresponding provision in the Charter notes:

“The Committee agreed that quarantine and other sanitary regulations are a subject to which the Organization should give careful attention with a view to preventing measures ‘necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health’ from being applied in a manner which would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on international trade and to advising Members how they can maintain such measures without causing such prejudice. In view of this, the Committee assumes that the Organization will establish a regular procedure with a view to investigating (in consultation, when it considers this advisable, with other intergovernmental specialized agencies of recognized scientific and technical competence, such as the FAO) any complaints that might be brought by a Member as to the use of the exception in sub-paragraph 1(a)(iii) of Article 45 [(b) of XX] in a manner inconsistent with the provisions of the preamble to that paragraph”.¹⁸

In the 1987 Panel Report on “Japan - Customs Duties, Taxes and Labelling Practices on Imported Wines and Alcoholic Beverages”, in discussing the claim of Japan that discriminatory or protective taxes on various alcoholic beverages could be justified as designed to meet the objective of taxation according to ability to pay, the Panel noted the scope provided to domestic tax systems under Article III; it also noted that “... The ‘general exceptions’ provided for in GATT Article XX might also justify internal tax differentiations among like or directly competitive products, for instance if ‘necessary to protect human ... or plant life or health’ (Article XX(b)). The Panel found, therefore, that the General Agreement reserved each contracting party a large degree of freedom to decide autonomously on the objectives, level, principles and methods of its internal taxation of goods”.¹⁹

The 1990 Panel Report on “Thailand - Restrictions on Importation of and Internal Taxes on Cigarettes”²⁰ examined measures by Thailand prohibiting imports of cigarettes. The Panel found that these measures were inconsistent with Article XI. Thailand claimed that the restrictions were justified under Article XX(b) because measures which could only be effective if cigarette imports were prohibited had been adopted by the government to control smoking and because additives in United States cigarettes might make them more harmful than Thai cigarettes. The Panel heard from an expert of the World Health Organization (WHO).

“The Panel ... defined the issues which arose under [Article XX(b)]. In agreement with the parties to the dispute and the expert from the WHO, the Panel accepted that smoking constituted a serious risk to human health and that consequently measures designed to reduce the consumption of cigarettes fell within the scope of Article XX(b). The Panel noted that this provision clearly allowed contracting parties to give priority to human health over trade liberalization; however, for a measure to be covered by Article XX(b) it had to be ‘necessary’.

“The Panel noted that a previous panel had discussed the meaning of the term ‘necessary’ in the context of Article XX(d), which provides an exemption for measures which are ‘necessary to secure compliance with laws or regulations which are not inconsistent’ with the provisions of the General Agreement. The panel had stated that

‘a contracting party cannot justify a measure inconsistent with other GATT provisions as “necessary” in terms of Article XX(d) if an alternative measure which it could reasonably be expected to employ and which is not inconsistent with other GATT provisions is available to it. By the same token, in cases where a measure consistent with other GATT provisions is not reasonably available, a contracting party is bound to use, among the measures reasonably available to it, that which entails the least degree of inconsistency with other GATT provisions’.²¹

“The Panel could see no reason why under Article XX the meaning of the term ‘necessary’ under paragraph (d) should not be the same as in paragraph (b). In both paragraphs the same term was used and the same objective intended: to allow contracting parties to impose trade restrictive measures inconsistent with the General Agreement to pursue overriding public policy goals to the extent that such inconsistencies were unavoidable. The fact that paragraph (d) applies to inconsistencies resulting from the enforcement of GATT-consistent laws and regulations while paragraph (b) applies to those resulting from health-related policies therefore did not justify a different interpretation of the term ‘necessary’.

²¹The note to this paragraph refers to the Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930”, L/6439, adopted on 7 November 1989, paragraph 5.26.

“The Panel concluded from the above that the import restrictions imposed by Thailand could be considered to be ‘necessary’ in terms of Article XX(b) only if there were no alternative measure consistent with the General Agreement, or less inconsistent with it, which Thailand could reasonably be expected to employ to achieve its health policy objectives. The Panel noted that contracting parties may, in accordance with Article III:4 of the General Agreement, impose laws, regulations and requirements affecting the internal sale, offering for sale, purchase, transportation, distribution or use of imported products provided they do not thereby accord treatment to imported products less favourable than that accorded to ‘like’ products of national origin. The United States argued that Thailand could achieve its public health objectives through internal measures consistent with Article III:4 and that the inconsistency with Article XI:1 could therefore not be considered to be ‘necessary’ within the meaning of Article XX(b). The Panel proceeded to examine this issue in detail.

“The Panel noted that the principal health objectives advanced by Thailand to justify its import restrictions were to protect the public from harmful ingredients in imported cigarettes, and to reduce the consumption of cigarettes in Thailand. The measures could thus be seen as intended to ensure the quality and reduce the quantity of cigarettes sold in Thailand.

“The Panel then examined whether the Thai concerns about the quality of cigarettes consumed in Thailand could be met with measures consistent, or less inconsistent, with the General Agreement. It noted that other countries had introduced strict, non-discriminatory labelling and ingredient disclosure regulations which allowed governments to control, and the public to be informed of, the content of cigarettes. A non-discriminatory regulation implemented on a national treatment basis in accordance with Article III:4 requiring complete disclosure of ingredients, coupled with a ban on unhealthy substances, would be an alternative consistent with the General Agreement. The Panel considered that Thailand could reasonably be expected to take such measures to address the quality-related policy objectives it now pursues through an import ban on all cigarettes whatever their ingredients.

“The Panel then considered whether Thai concerns about the quantity of cigarettes consumed in Thailand could be met by measures reasonably available to it and consistent, or less inconsistent, with the General Agreement. The Panel first examined how Thailand might reduce the demand for cigarettes in a manner consistent with the General Agreement. The Panel noted the view expressed by the WHO that the demand for cigarettes, in particular the initial demand for cigarettes by the young, was influenced by cigarette advertisements and that bans on advertisement could therefore curb such demand. At the Forty-third World Health Assembly a resolution was approved stating that the WHO is:

‘Encouraged by ... recent information demonstrating the effectiveness of tobacco control strategies, and in particular ... comprehensive legislative bans and other restrictive measures to effectively control the direct and the indirect advertising, promotion and sponsorship of tobacco’.²²

“The resolution goes on to urge all member states of the WHO

‘to consider including in their tobacco control strategies plans for legislation or other effective measures at the appropriate government level providing for: ...

- (c) progressive restrictions and concerted actions to eliminate eventually all direct and indirect advertising, promotion and sponsorship concerning tobacco’

“A ban on the advertisement of cigarettes of both domestic and foreign origin would normally meet the requirements of Article III:4. It might be argued that such a general ban on all cigarette advertising would create unequal competitive opportunities between the existing Thai supplier of cigarettes and new, foreign suppliers and was therefore contrary to Article III:4.²³ Even if this argument were accepted, such an inconsistency would have to be regarded as unavoidable and therefore necessary within the meaning of ²²The note to this paragraph refers to the Forty-third World Health Assembly, Fourteenth plenary meeting, Agenda Item 10, 17 May 1990 (A43/VR/14; WHA43.16).

²³The note to this sentence provides: “On the requirement of equal competitive opportunities, see the Report of the panel on ‘United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930’ (L/6439, paragraph 5.26, adopted on 7 November 1989)’”.

Article XX(b) because additional advertising rights would risk stimulating demand for cigarettes. The Panel noted that Thailand had already implemented some non-discriminatory controls on demand, including information programmes, bans on direct and indirect advertising, warnings on cigarette packs, and bans on smoking in certain public places.

“The Panel then examined how Thailand might restrict the supply of cigarettes in a manner consistent with the General Agreement. The Panel noted that contracting parties may maintain governmental monopolies, such as the Thai Tobacco Monopoly, on the importation and domestic sale of products.²⁴ The Thai Government may use this monopoly to regulate the overall supply of cigarettes, their prices and their retail availability provided it thereby does not accord imported cigarettes less favourable treatment than domestic cigarettes or act inconsistently with any commitments assumed under its Schedule of Concessions.²⁵ As to the pricing of cigarettes, the Panel noted that the Forty-third World Health Assembly, in its resolution cited above, stated that it was:

‘Encouraged by ... recent information demonstrating the effectiveness of tobacco control strategies, and in particular ... policies to achieve progressive increases in the real price of tobacco.’

‘to consider including in their tobacco control strategies plans for ... progressive financial measures aimed at discouraging the use of tobacco’.²⁶

“For these reasons the Panel could not accept the argument of Thailand that competition between imported and domestic cigarettes would necessarily lead to an increase in the total sales of cigarettes and that Thailand therefore had no option but to prohibit cigarette imports.

“The Panel then examined further the resolutions of the WHO on smoking which the WHO made available. It noted that the health measures recommended by the WHO in these resolutions were non-discriminatory and concerned all, not just imported, cigarettes. The Panel also examined the Report of the WHO Expert Committee on Smoking Control Strategies in Developing Countries. The Panel observed that a common consequence of import restrictions was the promotion of domestic production and the fostering of interests in the maintenance of that production and that the WHO Expert Committee had made the following recommendation relevant in this respect:

‘Where tobacco is already a commercial crop every effort should be made to reduce its role in the national economy, and to investigate alternative uses of land and labour. The existence of a tobacco industry of any kind should not be permitted to interfere with the implementation of educational and other measures to control smoking’.²⁷

“In sum, the Panel considered that there were various measures consistent with the General Agreement which were reasonably available to Thailand to control the quality and quantity of cigarettes smoked and which, taken together, could achieve the health policy goals that the Thai government pursues by restricting the importation of cigarettes inconsistently with Article XI:1. The Panel found therefore that Thailand’s practice of permitting the sale of domestic cigarettes while not permitting the importation of foreign cigarettes was an inconsistency with the General Agreement not ‘necessary’ within the meaning of Article XX(b)”.²⁸

In the November 1990 Council discussion preceding the adoption of this Panel Report, the representative of Thailand stated that “it was clear from the present Panel report that Thailand’s cigarette régime was based on public health policy considerations. His Government intended to take all measures necessary to prevent an increase in tobacco consumption, and to reduce it if possible. Thailand took heart from the report that a set of GATT-consistent measures could be taken to control both the supply of and demand for cigarettes, as long as they were applied to both domestic and imported cigarettes on a national-treatment basis. He concluded by saying that as a contracting party, Thailand intended to abide by its GATT obligations. It had lifted its import ban, and its present laws and regulations were in accordance with the national-treatment principle. On the other hand, Thailand needed to ensure that it would not be forced to accept conditions imposed above and beyond its GATT obligations”.²⁹

In the 1991 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna”, which has not been adopted, the Panel examined the provisions of the Marine Mammal Protection Act (MMPA) providing for a prohibition of imports of certain yellowfin tuna and yellowfin tuna products, and the import ban imposed under these provisions.

“The Panel noted that the United States considered the prohibition of imports of certain yellowfin tuna and certain yellowfin tuna products from Mexico, and the provisions of the MMPA on which this prohibition is based, to be justified by Article XX(b) because they served solely the purpose of protecting dolphin life and health and were ‘necessary’ within the meaning of that provision because, in respect of the protection of dolphin life and health outside its jurisdiction, there was no alternative measure reasonably available to the United States to achieve this objective. Mexico considered that Article XX(b) was not applicable to a measure imposed to protect the life or health of animals outside the jurisdiction of the contracting party taking it and that the import prohibition imposed by the United States was not necessary because alternative means consistent with the General Agreement were available to it to protect dolphin lives or health, namely international co-operation between the countries concerned.

“The Panel noted that the basic question raised by these arguments, namely whether Article XX(b) covers measures necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health outside the jurisdiction of the contracting party taking the measure, is not clearly answered by the text of that provision. It refers to life and health protection generally without expressly limiting that protection to the jurisdiction of the contracting party concerned. The Panel therefore decided to analyze this issue in the light of the drafting history of Article XX(b), the purpose of this provision, and the consequences that the interpretations proposed by the parties would have for the operation of the General Agreement as a whole.

“The Panel noted that the proposal for Article XX(b) dated from the Draft Charter of the International Trade Organization (ITO) proposed by the United States, which stated in Article 32, ‘Nothing in Chapter IV [on commercial policy] of this Charter shall be construed to prevent the adoption or enforcement by any Member of measures: ... (b) necessary to protect human, animal or plant life or health’. In the New York Draft of the ITO Charter, the preamble had been revised to read as it does at present, and exception (b) read: ‘For the purpose of protecting human, animal or plant life or health, if corresponding domestic safeguards under similar conditions exist in the importing country’. This added proviso reflected concerns regarding the abuse of sanitary regulations by importing countries. Later, Commission A of the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee in Geneva agreed to drop this proviso as unnecessary.³⁰ Thus, the record indicates that the concerns of the drafters of Article XX(b) focused on the use of sanitary measures to safeguard life or health of humans, animals or plants within the jurisdiction of the importing country.

“The Panel further noted that Article XX(b) allows each contracting party to set its human, animal or plant life or health standards. The conditions set out in Article XX(b) which limit resort to this exception, namely that the measure taken must be ‘necessary’ and not ‘constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on international trade’, refer to the trade measure requiring justification under Article XX(b), not however to the life or health standard chosen by the contracting party. The Panel recalled the finding of a previous panel that this paragraph of Article XX was intended to allow contracting parties to impose trade restrictive measures inconsistent with the General Agreement to pursue overriding public policy goals to the extent that such inconsistencies were unavoidable.³¹ The Panel considered that if the broad interpretation of Article XX(b) suggested by the United States were accepted, each contracting party could unilaterally determine the life or health protection policies from which other contracting parties could not deviate without jeopardizing their rights under the General Agreement. The General Agreement would then no longer constitute a multilateral framework for trade among all contracting parties but would provide legal security only in respect of trade between a limited number of contracting parties with identical internal regulations.

“The Panel considered that the United States’ measures, even if Article XX(b) were interpreted to permit extrajurisdictional protection of life and health, would not meet the requirement of necessity set out in that provision. The United States had not demonstrated to the Panel - as required of the party invoking an Article XX exception - that it had exhausted all options reasonably available to it to pursue its dolphin protection objectives through measures consistent with the General Agreement, in particular through the negotiation of international cooperative arrangements, which would seem to be desirable in view of the fact that dolphins roam the waters of many states and the high seas. Moreover, even assuming that an import prohibition were the only resort reasonably available to the United States, the particular measure chosen by the United States could in the Panel’s view not be considered to be necessary within the meaning of Article XX(b). The United States linked the maximum incidental dolphin taking rate which Mexico had to meet during a particular period in order to be able to export tuna to the United States to the taking rate actually recorded for United States fishermen during the same period. Consequently, the Mexican authorities could not know whether, at a given point of time, their policies conformed to the United States’ dolphin protection standards. The Panel considered that a limitation on trade based on such unpredictable conditions could not be regarded as necessary to protect the health or life of dolphins.

“On the basis of the above considerations, the Panel found that the United States’ direct import prohibition imposed on certain yellowfin tuna and certain yellowfin tuna products of Mexico and the provisions of the MMPA under which it is imposed could not be justified under the exception in Article XX(b).”³²

(2) Publication, notification and consultations concerning measures taken under paragraph (b)

The provisions of Article XXII in the 30 October 1947 text of the General Agreement (and the corresponding provisions in Article 41 of the Havana Charter) provided for consultations concerning “such representations as may be made by any other contracting party with respect to [various enumerated matters and] sanitary laws and regulations for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health, and generally all matters affecting the operation of this Agreement”. The listing of specific matters in Article XXII was deleted as unnecessary during the 1954-55 Review Session; see Section III under Article XXII.

“The provisions for consultation require Members, subject to the exceptions specifically set forth in this Charter, to supply to other Members, upon request, such information as will enable a full and fair appraisal of the matters which are the subject of such consultation, including the operation of sanitary laws and regulations for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health, and other matters affecting the application of Chapter IV”.

In 1969, the United Kingdom notified new measures imposed in the wake of the 1967/68 outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in the United Kingdom, including a ban on certain meat imports and imposition of requirements regarding compliance with animal health requirements, hygiene and public health inspection with respect to imports of boneless beef from countries where foot-and-mouth disease is endemic. The measures were accompanied by a reduction of the duty on beef imports. The notification stated “It must be emphasized the new measures are being taken solely as a result of the need to maintain high standards of animal and public health in the United Kingdom. There is no question of attempting to provide protection for our domestic industry and we consider the new measures to be fully compatible with the GATT and with Article XX in particular”.³⁶

Following the nuclear accident at Chernobyl in the Soviet Union, the EEC in May 1986 suspended imports of live animals, fresh meat and certain other fresh foods from certain East European countries. In the May 1986 meeting of the Council, the representative of Hungary stated that the selection of countries within a 1000 kilometer radius of the accident was unjustified and arbitrary; the radiation level had risen throughout most of Europe since the accident, and certain countries outside that radius had experienced a greater level of radiation than some within it. Hungary also recalled the recommendation of the World Health Organization according to which there was no public health justification to ban imports from East European countries. He expressed Hungary’s willingness to have its food products checked for radiation at the border by importing countries, and/or to certify freedom from radioactive contamination for each shipment. The representative of the EEC stressed that the measures were temporary and conservative, and stated that necessary data on radiation levels had not yet been received.³⁷ Austria notified the contracting parties of a temporary prohibition on imports of certain dairy, vegetable and fruit products originating in certain countries of Eastern and Southern Europe, following the Chernobyl accident; the prohibition was stated to be “in accordance with Article XX(b)”.³⁸

At the May 1989 Council meeting, Chile drew attention to the problem it had faced regarding the United States’ suspension of imports of Chilean fruit on the basis of suspected food contamination. Chile suggested that the Chairman hold consultations with interested contracting parties to study ways of setting up machinery which, while protecting the rights of contracting parties, would minimize the damage caused by similar measures. The delegate of Chile stated that “The measures taken had ... involved hundreds of millions of dollars of fruit and vegetables which had had to be destroyed or re-exported, confiscated or prohibited from entry because two grapes had been found to contain toxic chemicals. This situation had led Chile to believe that contracting parties should have a permanent expeditious system to hold consultations speedily, to exchange information and to arrive jointly at decisions – in short, a crisis management body ... to ensure that measures adopted would be in keeping with the dimension of the threat”.³⁹ A number of contracting parties supported this proposal, underlining the importance of the issues raised by Chile for food exporting countries. stated that governments had to be free to act expeditiously when human health was endangered, and could not be expected to consult extensively on the trade impact of their actions before responding to an urgent threat to human health.⁴⁰

At its meeting on 11 October 1989, the Chairman read out an agreed text, which noted that “During the course of the consultations and in the light of comments made by delegations, there seems to have emerged a consensus amongst the participating delegations that the matter under discussion is of interest to all contracting parties. Another element which emerged during the informal consultations was that some delegations, despite their recognition that a genuine problem exists, are doubtful whether it will be possible for their respective authorities in capitals to agree on a formalized GATT structure to deal with the problem”. The Council agreed to the Chairman’s proposal that the Council take note of his recommendation, entitled “Streamlined Mechanism for Reconciling the Interests of Contracting Parties in the Event of Trade-Damaging Acts”, that the following guidelines be used in the event of a trade-damaging act:

- “1. A measure taken by an importing contracting party should not be any more severe, and should not remain in force any longer, than necessary to protect the human, animal or plant life or health involved, as provided in Article XX(b).
- “2. The importing contracting party should notify the Director-General as quickly as possible. A notification by telephone should be followed immediately by a written communication from the importing contracting party, which would be circulated to contracting parties.
- “3. The importing contracting party would be expected to agree to expeditious informal consultations with the principally concerned contracting party as soon as a trade-damaging act has occurred, with a view to reaching a common view about the dimension of the problem and the best way to deal with it effectively.”⁴¹

In December 1989, at the Forty-fifth Session, Austria informed the CONTRACTING PARTIES that with effect from 1 December 1989, Austria had limited traffic of certain heavy trucks during night hours on certain Austrian transit roads; the representative of Austria stated that “This measure has become unavoidable due to the intolerable increase in heavy traffic on certain transit routes causing extreme noise and pollution seriously endangering the health of the adjacent Austrian population. This measure has been taken in accordance with Article XX(b) of the General Agreement”. The measure applied to trucks of all nationalities, including Austrian trucks. Austria also noted that in retaliation Germany had decided to ban as of 1 January 1990 the circulation of 212,000 Austrian lorries during night hours in the entire territory of Germany. Consultations were held under Article XXII:1 regarding the German measure in spring 1990.⁴²

In 1991, Peru drew the Council’s attention to restrictions imposed on exports of Peru following the cholera epidemic in Peru, and sought application of these 1989 guidelines, referring to a World Health Assembly resolution calling on member States not to apply to countries affected by the cholera epidemic import restrictions not justifiable on public health grounds. Pursuant to the 1989 guidelines, the EEC notified a prohibition on imports from Peru of certain food products unless accompanied by a certificate of freedom from cholera, and Austria notified with reference to Article XX(b) a prohibition on imports of fishery products from Peru.⁴³ In October 1993, Austria notified two prohibitions on importation of certain live animals and animal products from specific countries or districts, imposed in line with Article XX(b) and in order to prevent the introduction of classical swine fever and of foot-and-mouth disease into Austria; the notification was without reference to the 1989 guidelines. In July and October 1994 Austria again notified such restrictions.⁴⁴

4. Paragraph (c): “relating to the importation or exportation of gold and silver”

The Panel Report on “Canada - Measures Affecting the Sale of Gold Coins”, which has not been adopted, examined a tax measure of the province of Ontario imposing a retail sales tax on gold coins and exempting from this tax Maple Leaf gold coins struck by the Canadian Mint. The Panel noted that while both the Maple Leaf and the Krugerrand were legal tender in their respective countries of origin, both were normally purchased as investment goods, and therefore considered that the Maple Leaf and Krugerrand gold coins were not only means of payment but also “products” within the meaning of Article III:2.⁴⁶

The Working Party on “The Haitian Tobacco Monopoly” in 1955 examined whether the licensing of tobacco imports by the Tobacco Régie required a release under the provisions of Article XVIII:12: “... the representative of Haiti stated that the measure was necessary to secure compliance with the Law of 16 February 1948, which established the Tobacco Régie ... and that it was ‘not applied in a manner which would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination between countries where the same conditions prevail, or a disguised restriction on international trade.’ In the light of this statement the Working Party considered that Article [XX(d)] would be applicable to the measure if the basic regulations were not in conflict with any provision of the Agreement”.⁴⁷

The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” dealt with the claim by the European Economic Community that the special “Section 337” procedure for enforcing patent claims against imported products treated such products less favourably than the procedures applicable to patent claims involving products of domestic origin, contrary to Article III:4, and that this special procedure was not justified under Article XX(d) as “necessary” to enforce U.S. patent laws against imports.

“The Panel noted that the parties to the dispute agreed that, for the purposes of Article XX(d), Section 337 can be considered as ‘measures ... to secure compliance with’ United States patent law ... and ... examined whether, in respect of the elements of Section 337 found to be inconsistent with Article III:4 of the General Agreement, the conditions specified in Article XX(d) to justify measures otherwise inconsistent with the GATT are met. These are:

- that the ‘laws or regulations’ with which compliance is being secured are themselves ‘not inconsistent’ with the General Agreement;
- that the measures are ‘necessary to secure compliance’ with those laws or regulations;
- that the measures are ‘not applied in a manner which would constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination between countries where the same conditions prevail, or a disguised restriction on international trade’.

“The Panel noted that each of these conditions must be met if an inconsistency with another GATT provision is to be justifiable under Article XX(d). A measure which does not meet any one of these conditions, for example the condition that it must be ‘necessary to secure compliance’ with a law consistent with the GATT, cannot be justified under Article XX(d).⁴⁸

(2) “necessary”

The 1983 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies” examined claims by Canada regarding an exclusion order issued by the U.S. International Trade Commission (ITC) under Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930, including arguments that “The exception under Article XX(d) did not justify trade restrictive measures taken pursuant to Section 337 on two grounds: (1) differential treatment of foreign products involving a separate adjudicating process was not ‘necessary’ to secure compliance with United States patent laws, and (2) the law with which compliance was sought (Section 337) was ‘inconsistent with the provisions of this agreement’, i.e. Article III of the GATT”.⁴⁹ In its findings,

“The Panel considered whether the ITC action, in making the exclusion order, was ‘necessary’ in the sense of paragraph (d) of Article XX to secure compliance with United States patent law. In this connection the Panel examined whether a satisfactory and effective alternative existed under civil court procedures which would have provided the patent holder Kuhlman with a sufficiently effective remedy against the violation of its patent by foreign producers including the Canadian producer Wallbank Manufacturing Co. Ltd. ...

“... it was the view of the Panel that the only way in which, under existing United States law, Kuhlman’s right to the exclusive use of its patent in the United States domestic market could be effectively protected against the importation of the infringing product would be to resort to the exclusion order procedure. For the above reasons, therefore, the Panel found that the exclusion order issued by the ITC under Section 337 of the United States Tariff Act of 1930 was ‘necessary’ in the sense of Article XX(d) to prevent the importation and sale of automotive spring assemblies infringing the patent, thus protecting the patent holder’s rights and securing compliance with United States patent law.”⁵⁰

“The Panel did not ... exclude the strong possibility that there might be cases ... where a procedure before a United States court might provide the patent holder with an equally satisfactory and effective remedy against infringement of his patent rights. In such cases the use of an exclusion order under Section 337 might not be necessary in terms of Article XX(d) to secure compliance with laws and regulations (i.e. United States patent law) which were not inconsistent with the General Agreement.”⁵¹

“... The Panel pointed out that its finding ... that the exclusion order issued by the ITC was ‘necessary’ within the meaning of Article XX(d) had been made on the basis of existing United States law. It carried no implication that the use of Section 337 was an entirely satisfactory means of dealing with patent based cases”.⁵²

In the Council discussion of the Panel Report, the representative of Canada stated “that the Panel qualified its conclusions by emphasizing that it was under existing United States law that Section 337 orders would often be necessary. This would seem to suggest that if a contracting party elects not to equip itself with effective enforcement procedures with respect to imports for its law of general application, then it is free to deny national treatment, even to the extent of having a discriminatory adjudicative process”.⁵³ Some other contracting parties also expressed concern at the Panel conclusions.⁵⁴ The Panel Report was adopted “on the understanding that this shall not foreclose future examination of the use of Section 337 to deal with patent infringement cases from the point of view of consistency with Articles III and XX of the General Agreement”.⁵⁵

The 1984 Panel Report on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act” examined the argument by Canada that, if the Panel were to find purchase undertakings entered into between foreign investors and the government of Canada to be inconsistent with Article III:4, these would fall under Article XX(d) because the purchase undertakings were “necessary to secure compliance” with the Foreign Investment Review Act.

“... On the basis of the explanations given by Canada the Panel could not ... conclude that the purchase undertakings that were found to be inconsistent with Article III:4 are necessary for the effective administration of the Act. The Panel is in particular not convinced that, in order to achieve the aims of the Act, investors submitting applications under the Act had to be bound to purchasing practices having the effect of giving preference to domestic products. It was not clear to the Panel why a detailed review of investment proposals without purchasing requirements would not be sufficient to enable the Canadian government to determine whether the proposed investments were or were likely to be of significant benefit to Canada within the meaning of Section 2 of the Foreign Investment Review Act.”⁵⁶

The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” contains the following passage:

“The Panel noted that the United States and the Community interpret the term ‘necessary’ differently. They differ as to whether it requires the use of the least trade-restrictive measure available. They also differ as to whether ‘necessity’ to use measures that accord less favourable treatment to imported products can be created by a contracting party’s choice, in its national legislation, of enforcement measures against domestic products that would not be effective against imports ...

“It was clear to the Panel that a contracting party cannot justify a measure inconsistent with another GATT provision as ‘necessary’ in terms of Article XX(d) if an alternative measure which it could reasonably be expected to employ and which is not inconsistent with other GATT provisions is available to it. By the same token, in cases where a measure consistent with other GATT provisions is not reasonably available, a contracting party is bound to use, among the measures reasonably available to it, that which entails the least degree of inconsistency with other GATT provisions. The Panel wished to make it clear that this does not mean that a contracting party could be asked to change its substantive patent law or its desired level of enforcement of that law, provided that such law and such level of enforcement are the same for imported and domestically-produced products. However, it does mean that, if a contracting party could reasonably secure that level of enforcement in a manner that is not inconsistent with other GATT provisions, it would be required to do so.

“Bearing in mind the foregoing and that it is up to the contracting party seeking to justify measures under Article XX(d) to demonstrate that those measures are ‘necessary’ within the meaning of that provision, the Panel considered whether the inconsistencies that it had found with Article III:4 can be justified as ‘necessary’ in terms of Article XX(d). The Panel first examined the argument of the United States that the Panel should consider not whether the individual elements of Section 337 are ‘necessary’ but rather whether Section 337 as a system is ‘necessary’ for the enforcement of United States patent laws. ... The Panel did not accept this contention since it would permit contracting parties to introduce GATT inconsistencies that are not necessary simply by making them part of a scheme which contained elements that are necessary. In the view of the Panel, what has to be justified as ‘necessary’ under Article XX(d) is each of the inconsistencies with another GATT Article found to exist, i.e. in this case, whether the differences between Section 337 and federal district court procedures that result in less favourable treatment of imported products within the meaning of Article III:4, as outlined above ... are necessary.”⁵⁷

The Panel went on to discuss the necessity of certain aspects of Section 337 which it had found were inconsistent with Article III:4:

⁵⁷L/6439, adopted on 7 November 1989, 36S/345, 392-393, paras. 5.25-5.27.

“The United States suggested that Section 337 can be justified because, under United States law, it provides the only means of enforcement of United States patent rights against imports of products manufactured abroad by means of a process patented in the United States. ... The Panel considered that, even if it were accepted that a different scheme for imports alleged to infringe process patents is necessary, this could not in itself justify as ‘necessary’ in terms of Article XX(d) any of the specific inconsistencies with Article III:4 summarised in paragraph 5.20 above. In any event, the Panel did not consider that a different scheme for imports alleged to infringe process patents is necessary, since many countries grant to their civil courts jurisdiction over imports of products manufactured abroad under processes protected by patents of the importing country. The Panel noted that, in the 1988 Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act, the United States has in fact amended its law to this effect (see Annex II).

“The United States also suggested that certain features of Section 337 are necessary in order to permit Presidential review, which is in the interests of respondents ... The Panel did not believe that this provided an argument for necessity in terms of Article XX(d), since Presidential review is not necessary in order to secure compliance with United States patent legislation; it is not, of course, available in United States patent litigation involving challenged products of domestic origin.

“The United States suggested that Section 337 is needed because of difficulties with service of process on and enforcement of judgments against foreign manufacturers As regards service of process, the difference in procedures between Section 337 and federal district courts was not itself alleged to be inconsistent with any GATT provision; and the Panel did not see why any of the inconsistencies with Article III:4 are a necessary accompaniment of arrangements for effective service of process where imported products are concerned. However, as noted in paragraph 5.19 above, the Panel found the differences in procedures for the enforcement of judgments to be inconsistent with Article III:4 in that they provide for the possibility of in rem general exclusion orders against imported products when no equivalent remedy is available against products of United States origin; and that they provide for automatic customs enforcement of exclusion orders while the enforcement of a court injunction requires the initiation of proceedings by the successful party.

“The United States stressed the importance to its system of enforcement of in rem orders, and the Panel considered this question at some length. The Panel agreed with the United States that taking action against infringing products at the source, that is at the point of their production, would generally be more difficult in respect of imported products than in respect of products of national origin: imported products are produced outside the jurisdiction of national enforcement bodies and it is seldom feasible to secure enforcement of the rulings of a court of the country of importation by local courts in the country of production. In personam action against importers would not in all cases be an adequate substitute for action against the manufacturer, not only because importers might be very numerous and not easily brought into a single judicial proceeding, but also, and more importantly, because as soon as activities of known importers were stopped it would often be possible for a foreign manufacturer to find another importer. For these reasons the Panel believed that there could be an objective need in terms of Article XX(d) to apply limited in rem exclusion orders to imported products, although no equivalent remedy is applied against domestically-produced products.

“A limited in rem order applying to imported products can thus be justified, for the reasons presented in the previous paragraph, as the functional equivalent of an injunction enjoining named domestic manufacturers. However, these reasons do not justify as ‘necessary’ in terms of Article XX(d) the inconsistency with Article III:4 found in respect of general exclusion orders; this is that such orders apply to products produced by persons who have not been named as respondents in the litigation, while no equivalent measure applicable to non-parties is available where products of United States origin are concerned. The United States informed the Panel that the situations which under Section 337 could justify a general exclusion order against imported products are a widespread pattern of unauthorised use of the patented invention or process and a reason to infer that manufacturers other than respondents to the investigation might enter the United States market with infringing products. However, the Panel saw no reason why these situations could not also occur in respect of products produced in the United States. Nevertheless, the Panel did not rule out entirely that there could sometimes be objective reasons why general in rem exclusion orders might be ‘necessary’ in terms of Article XX(d) against imported products even though no equivalent measure was needed against products of United States origin. For example, in the case of imported products it might be considerably more difficult to identify the source of infringing products or to prevent circumvention of orders limited to the products of named persons, than in the case of products of United States origin. Of course, the United States could bring the provision of general exclusion orders into consistency with Article III:4 by providing for the application in like situations of equivalent measures against products of United States origin.

“As noted above, the Panel found an inconsistency with Article III:4 in the fact that Section 337 exclusion orders are automatically enforced by the Customs Service, whereas the enforcement of injunctions against products of United States origin requires the successful plaintiff to bring individual proceedings. However, in this case the Panel accepted the argument of necessity in terms of Article XX(d). A United States manufacturer which has been enjoined by a federal district court order can normally be expected to comply with that injunction, because it would know that failure to do so would incur the risk of serious penalties resulting from a contempt proceeding brought by the successful plaintiff. An injunction should therefore normally suffice to stop enjoined activity without the need for subsequent action to enforce it. As far as imported products are concerned, enforcement at the border by the customs administration of exclusion orders can be considered as a means necessary to render such orders effective.

“The Panel considered the argument of the United States that many of the procedural aspects of Section 337 reflect the need to provide expeditious prospective relief against infringing imports. ... The Panel understood this argument to be based on the notion that, in respect of infringing imports, there would be greater difficulty than in respect of infringing products of domestic origin in collecting awards of damages for past infringement, because foreign manufacturers are outside the jurisdiction of national courts and importers might have little by way of assets. In the Panel’s view, given the issues at stake in typical patent suits, this argument could only provide a justification for rapid preliminary or conservatory action against imported products, combined with the necessary safeguards to protect the legitimate interests of importers in the event that the products prove not to be infringing. The tight time-limits for the conclusion of Section 337 proceedings, when no comparable time-limits apply in federal district court, and the other features of Section 337 inconsistent with Article III:4 that serve to facilitate the expeditious completion of Section 337 proceedings, such as the inadmissibility of counterclaims, cannot be justified as ‘necessary’ on this basis.

“The United States did not advance, nor was the Panel aware of, any other arguments that might justify as necessary any of the elements of Section 337 that had been found to be inconsistent with Article III:4 of the General Agreement. On the basis of the preceding review and analysis, the Panel found that the system of determining allegations of violation of United States patent rights under Section 337 of the United States Tariff Act cannot be justified as necessary within the meaning of Article XX(d) so as to permit an exception to the basic obligation contained in Article III:4 of the General Agreement. The Panel, however, repeats that, as indicated in paragraphs 5.32 and 5.33 above, some of the inconsistencies with Article III:4 of individual aspects of procedures under Section 337 could be justified under Article XX(d) in certain circumstances”.⁵⁸

The 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Measures Affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages” examined, inter alia, the invocation of Article XX(d) with respect to a discriminatory requirement that imported beer be distributed through in-state wholesalers:

“The Panel then recalled the United States alternative argument that the requirement that imported beer be distributed through in-state wholesalers, which requirement was not imposed in the case of beer from in-state breweries, was justified under Article XX(d) as a measure necessary to secure compliance with laws or regulations which were not inconsistent with the provisions of the General Agreement. ...

“... The Panel also noted the practice of the CONTRACTING PARTIES of interpreting these Article XX exceptions narrowly, placing the burden on the party invoking an exception to justify its use.

“The Panel recalled the position of the United States that there was no reasonable alternative to the existing regulatory scheme in the various states which required out-of-state and imported beer to be distributed to retailers via in-state wholesalers while allowing in-state beer to be shipped directly from producers to retailers. The United States considered that the wholesaler was the only reasonable place for beer excise taxes to be collected for out-of-state and foreign products, but that there was no such necessity with respect to products from in-state producers that were, by definition, under the jurisdiction of the state. The Panel further recalled the position of Canada that the burden was on the United States to specify and demonstrate the consistency with the General Agreement of the laws for which it was trying to secure compliance and to show that there were no less trade restrictive measures available to secure compliance with them.

“The Panel was of the view that even if, as argued by the United States, the requirement to use wholesalers is considered as a ‘measure to secure compliance’ in terms of Article XX(d) and the respective state liquor laws are considered as ‘laws ... not inconsistent with the provisions of this Agreement’ notwithstanding the above-mentioned Panel findings on inconsistency with Article III, the United States has not demonstrated that discriminatory requirements to use wholesalers are ‘necessary’ in terms of Article XX(d) to enforce the liquor tax laws. The Panel recalled a finding of an earlier panel ‘that a contracting party cannot justify a measure inconsistent with another GATT provision as “necessary” in terms of Article XX(d) if an alternative measure which it could reasonably be expected to employ and which is not inconsistent with other GATT provisions is available to it’.⁵⁹ The Panel considered that the United States has not met its burden of showing that the specific inconsistency with Article III:4 of the discriminatory wholesaler requirements in the various states is the only reasonable measure available to secure enforcement of state excise tax laws. The fact that not all fifty states maintain discriminatory systems indicates to the Panel that alternative measures for enforcement of state excise tax laws do indeed exist”.⁶⁰

The same Panel also examined the United States’ invocation of Article XX(d) with respect to a requirement in some states that alcoholic beverages transported into the state be transported by state-licensed common carriers while in-state producers could deliver their product in their own vehicles.

“The Panel was of the view that its considerations with respect to Article XX(d) in relation to the wholesaler requirement apply equally here. It was incumbent upon the United States to demonstrate that particular laws for which compliance is being sought are consistent with the General Agreement and that the inconsistency with Article III:4 of the discriminatory common carrier requirement for imported beer and wine is necessary to secure compliance with those laws. In the view of the Panel, the United States has not demonstrated that the common carrier requirement is the least trade restrictive enforcement measure available to the various states and that less restrictive measures, e.g. record-keeping requirements of retailers and importers, are not sufficient for tax administration purposes. In this regard, the Panel noted that not all fifty states of the United States maintain common carrier requirements. It thus appeared to the Panel that some states have found alternative, and possibly less trade restrictive, and GATT-consistent, ways of enforcing their tax laws. The Panel accordingly found that the United States has not met its burden of proof in respect of its claimed Article XX(d) justification for the common carrier requirement of the various states”.⁶¹

(3) “to secure compliance”

In the Panel Report on “EEC - Regulation on Imports of Parts and Components” the Panel examined the consistency with the General Agreement of Article 13:10 of Council Regulation No. 2176/84 on anti-dumping.

⁵⁹The footnote to this sentence in the panel report refers to the Report of the Panel on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930, adopted on 7 November 1989, 36S/345, 392.

⁶¹*Ibid.*, 39S/287-288, para. 5.52.

This provision was intended to prevent circumvention of anti-dumping duties on finished products through the importation of parts or materials for use in the assembly or production of like finished products within the EEC. Japan considered this provision to be inconsistent with the EEC's obligations under Articles I and II or III, and not justified by Article VI of the General Agreement. The EEC considered both the application of Article 13:10 and the Article itself to be justified by Article XX(d). "The Panel considered that the 'measure' referred to in Article XX is the measure requiring justification under Article XX and that, therefore, the imposition of anti-circumvention duties inconsistent with Article III:2 is the 'measure' in the present case. It further considered that the 'laws or regulations' to be examined under sub-paragraph (d) are the laws or regulations the contracting party invoking Article XX(d) claims to secure compliance with, in the present case the Council Regulations Nos. 2176/84 and 2423/88 (except for the anti-circumvention provision) and the individual Council regulations imposing definitive anti-dumping duties on finished products from Japan."⁶²

"The Panel noted that, in order for a measure to be covered by Article XX(d), it must 'secure compliance with' laws or regulations that are not inconsistent with the General Agreement. The Panel therefore proceeded to examine the question of whether the imposition of anti-circumvention duties inconsistent with Article III:2 is a measure 'to secure compliance with' the EEC's general anti-dumping regulations and the individual regulations imposing definitive anti-dumping duties. The essential argument of Japan on this point was that Article XX(d) permits contracting parties to take only measures to enforce the obligations provided for in the laws or regulations consistent with the General Agreement. The only part of the EEC's anti-dumping regulations that requires enforcement is the part establishing the obligation to pay anti-dumping duties. The anti-circumvention duties do not serve to secure the payment of these duties and can therefore in the view of Japan not be considered to be securing compliance with the EEC's anti-dumping regulations. The essential argument of the EEC was that the terms 'to secure compliance with' should be interpreted more broadly to cover not only the enforcement of laws and regulations per se but also the prevention of actions which have the effect of undermining the objectives of laws and regulations. In the view of the EEC, the anti-circumvention duties, being levied only in narrowly defined circumstances in which the objectives of the EEC's anti-dumping regulations are clearly being undermined, therefore secure compliance with these regulations within the meaning of Article XX(d).

"The Panel concluded from the above that the interpretative issue before it was: Does the qualification 'to secure compliance with laws or regulations' mean that the measure must prevent actions inconsistent with the obligations set out in laws or regulations, or does it support a more expansive interpretation according to which it would also cover a measure which prevents actions that are consistent with laws or regulations but undermine their objectives?

"The Panel first examined this interpretative issue in the light of the text of Article XX(d). The Panel noted that this provision does not refer to objectives of laws or regulations but only to laws or regulations. This suggests that Article XX(d) merely covers measures to secure compliance with laws and regulations as such and not with their objectives. The examples of the laws and regulations indicated in Article XX(d), namely 'those relating to customs enforcement, the enforcement of monopolies ..., the protection of patents ... and the prevention of deceptive practices' (emphasis added) also suggest that Article XX(d) covers only measures designed to prevent actions that would be illegal under the laws or regulations. This conclusion is further supported by the fact that the provision corresponding to Article XX(d) in the 1946 Suggested Charter for an International Trade Organization used the terms 'to induce compliance with' while Article XX(d) of the General Agreement uses the stricter language 'to secure compliance with' (emphasis added).

"The Panel then examined the alternative interpretations in the light of the purpose of Article XX(d) and found the following. If the qualification 'to secure compliance with laws and regulations' is interpreted to mean 'to enforce obligations under laws and regulations', the main function of Article XX(d) would be to permit contracting parties to act inconsistently with the General Agreement whenever such inconsistency is necessary to ensure that the obligations which the contracting parties may impose consistently with the General Agreement under their laws or regulations are effectively enforced.

If the qualification ‘to secure compliance with laws and regulations’ is interpreted to mean ‘to ensure the attainment of the objectives of the laws and regulations’, the function of Article XX(d) would be substantially broader. Whenever the objective of a law consistent with the General Agreement cannot be attained by enforcing the obligations under that law, the imposition of further obligations inconsistent with the General Agreement could then be justified under Article XX(d) on the grounds that this secures compliance with the objectives of that law. This cannot, in the view of the Panel, be the purpose of Article XX(d): each of the exceptions in the General Agreement - such as Articles VI, XII or XIX - recognizes the legitimacy of a policy objective but at the same time sets out conditions as to the obligations which may be imposed to secure the attainment of that objective. These conditions would no longer be effective if it were possible to justify under Article XX(d) the enforcement of obligations that may not be imposed consistently with these exceptions on the grounds that the objective recognized to be legitimate by the exception cannot be attained within the framework of the conditions set out in the exception.

“For the reasons indicated in the preceding paragraphs, the Panel found that Article XX(d) covers only measures related to the enforcement of obligations under laws or regulations consistent with the General Agreement. The Panel noted that the general anti-dumping Regulation of the EEC does not establish obligations that require enforcement; it merely establishes a legal framework for the authorities of the EEC. Only the individual regulations imposing definitive anti-dumping duties give rise to obligations that require enforcement, namely the obligation to pay a specified amount of anti-dumping duties. The Panel noted that the anti-circumvention duties do not serve to enforce the payment of anti-dumping duties. The Panel could, therefore, not establish that the anti-circumvention duties ‘secure compliance with’ obligations under the EEC’s anti-dumping regulations. The Panel concluded for these reasons that the duties could not be justified under Article XX(d).”⁶³

(4) “laws or regulations which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Agreement”

In discussing a proposed amendment to the Havana Charter provision corresponding to Article XX(d), “designed to exempt measures against so-called ‘social dumping’ from the provisions of Chapter IV, the Subcommittee expressed the view that this objective was covered for short-term purposes by paragraph 1 of Article 40 [XIX] and for long-term purposes by Article 7 in combination with Articles 93, 94 [XXIII] and 95”.⁶⁴

The 1983 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies” notes that the Panel “concluded that the laws and regulations which were not inconsistent with the General Agreement and with which compliance was to be secured were the patent laws of the United States, since the case in question was based on the allegation of an infringement of patent rights under United States patent law.”⁶⁵

The 1988 Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products” examined certain import quotas maintained by Japan. In response to the invocation of Article XX(d) by Japan in relation to import restrictions administered by an import monopoly, the Panel found that “Article XX(d) only exempts from the obligations under the General Agreement measures necessary to secure compliance with those laws and regulations ‘which are not inconsistent with the provisions of [the General] Agreement’. Article XX(d) therefore does not permit contracting parties to operate monopolies inconsistently with the other provisions of the General Agreement. ... The Panel therefore found that the enforcement of laws and regulations providing for an import restriction made effective through an import monopoly inconsistent with Article XI:1 was not covered by Article XX(d).”⁶⁶

The 1991 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna”, which has not been adopted, examined the “intermediary nations” embargo on imports of tuna under the US Marine Mammal Protection Act (MMPA), which required that the United States authorities implement a prohibition on imports of yellowfin tuna and yellowfin tuna products from “intermediary nations”; at the time of this panel proceeding the United States customs authorities refused entry to shipments of yellowfin tuna unless the importer declared that no yellowfin tuna or yellowfin tuna product in the shipment were harvested with purse-seine nets in the Eastern Tropical Pacific Ocean by vessels of Mexico. The Panel found that these measures and the provisions of the MMPA mandating them were inconsistent with Article XI:1.

“The Panel then proceeded to examine the consistency of the ‘intermediary nations’ embargo with Article XX(d), which the United States had invoked. ...

“The Panel noted that Article XX(d) requires that the ‘laws or regulations’ with which compliance is being secured be themselves ‘not inconsistent’ with the General Agreement. The Panel noted that the United States had argued that the ‘intermediary nations’ embargo was necessary to support the direct embargo because countries whose exports were subject to such an embargo should not be able to nullify the embargo’s effect by exporting to the United States indirectly through third countries. The Panel found that, given its finding that the direct embargo was inconsistent with the General Agreement, the ‘intermediary nations’ embargo and the provisions of the MMPA under which it is imposed could not be justified under Article XX(d) as a measure to secure compliance with ‘laws or regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this Agreement’.”⁶⁷

(5) “the enforcement of monopolies operated under paragraph 4 of Article II and Article XVII”

The London Report on discussions in the Preparatory Committee notes that “There was general agreement that restrictions or prohibitions on private trade might be imposed in order to protect the position of state-trading enterprises operated under other articles ...”.⁶⁹ Accordingly, the London and New York Charters included in Article 25:2 [XI:2] an exception to the general prohibition on quantitative restrictions, for import and export prohibitions or restrictions on private trade for the purpose of establishing a new, or maintaining an existing, monopoly of trade for a state-trading enterprise operating consistent with the Charter articles on state trading. During discussions at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, it was agreed to delete this provision from the article on quantitative restrictions, and to add language clarifying that such measures would be covered by the commercial policy exceptions clause corresponding to the present GATT Article XX(d).⁷⁰ The proposal to make this change was explained as follows:

“... these examples given under sub-paragraph (g) [XX(d)] are, in fact, only examples ... if any law or regulation is consistent with Chapter V, then any measure which is necessary for the enforcement of that law is taken care of here. ... the sole reason for mentioning state trading monopolies specifically here was that, in the case of a monopoly, the enforcement of that monopoly depends upon a prohibition against private trade, and in order to make it perfectly clear to certain Delegates that that was permitted, state trading monopolies were inserted as one of the examples”.⁷¹

It was also noted that “It is only if and when you have a monopoly that you need it protected by a restriction on imports. If by any chance you have a State-trading enterprise which is not a monopoly, it would no doubt simply go into the market and buy and sell alongside private traders, and there would be no occasion to have any restriction in that case at all”.⁷²

In the 1988 Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products”, in response to an argument by Japan concerning certain import restrictions administered through import monopolies:

“The Panel further examined whether Article XX(d) of the General Agreement justified import restrictions made effective through import monopolies. The Panel noted that Article XX(d) permits measures necessary to the enforcement of monopolies. Article XX(d) therefore permits measures necessary to enforce the exclusive possession of the trade by the monopoly, such as measures limiting private imports that would undermine the control of the trade by the monopoly. However, Article XX(d) only exempts from the obligations under the General Agreement measures necessary to secure compliance with those laws and regulations ‘which are not inconsistent with the provisions of [the General] Agreement’. Article XX(d) therefore does not permit contracting parties to operate monopolies inconsistently with the other provisions of the General Agreement. The General Agreement contains detailed rules designed to preclude protective and discriminatory practices by import monopolies (cf. in particular Article II:4, the note to Articles XI, XII, XIII, XIV and XVIII, and Article XVII). These rules would become meaningless if Article XX(d) were interpreted to exempt from the obligations under the General Agreement protective or discriminatory trading practices by such monopolies. The Panel therefore found that the enforcement of laws and regulations providing for an import restriction made effective through an import monopoly inconsistent with Article XI:1 was not covered by Article XX(d).”⁷³

(6) “protection of patents, trade marks and copyrights”

Drafts for an “Agreement on Measures to Discourage the Importation of Counterfeit Goods” were circulated in 1979 and 1982.⁷⁴ The preamble of the revised draft noted, inter alia, “that the contracting parties are exercising their rights under Article XX of the General Agreement, inter alia, to adopt or enforce laws and regulations relating to the protection of trademarks”. Following the Decision on Trade in Counterfeit Goods contained in the Ministerial Declaration of 29 November 1982,⁷⁵ the Director-General held consultations with the Director-General of the World Intellectual Property Organization (WIPO) on legal and institutional aspects involved in trade in counterfeit goods.⁷⁶ See also the 1985 Report of the Group of Experts on Trade in Counterfeit Goods.⁷⁷

In the 1983 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies”, “The Panel noted that, as far as it had been able to ascertain, this was the first time a specific case of patent infringement involving Article XX(d) had been brought before the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.⁷⁸ “The Panel noted that the GATT recognized, by the very existence of Article XX(d), the need to provide that certain measures taken by a contracting party to secure compliance with its national laws or regulations which otherwise would not be in conformity with the GATT obligations of that contracting party would, through the application of this provision under the conditions stipulated therein, be in conformity with the GATT provided that the national laws or regulations concerned were not inconsistent with the General Agreement. In this connection the Panel noted in particular that the protection of patents was one of the few areas of national laws and regulations expressly mentioned in Article XX(d).”⁷⁹

In the Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930”, “The Panel noted that in the dispute before it the ‘laws or regulations’ with which Section 337 secures compliance are the substantive patent laws of the United States and that the conformity of these laws with the General Agreement is not being challenged”.⁸⁰ In relation to the criterion of “necessary” in terms of Article XX(d), “The Panel wished to make it clear that this does not mean that a contracting party could be asked to change its substantive patent law or its desired level of enforcement of that law, provided that such law and such level of enforcement are the same for imported and domestically-produced products. However, it does mean that if a contracting party could reasonably secure that level of enforcement in a manner that is not inconsistent with other GATT provisions, it would be required to do so”.⁸¹

(7) “the prevention of deceptive practices”

It was agreed during discussions at the London sessions of the Preparatory Committee that the words “deceptive practices” were broad enough to cover cases of false marking of geographical origin.⁸²

In 1987, during the Working Party on the Accession of Portugal and Spain to the EEC, in response to a question regarding an EEC regulation on the use of the term “sherry”, the EEC stated that the regulation in question “constitutes a measure designed to prevent deceptive practices. It is therefore justified under Article XX(d) of the General Agreement”.⁸³

(8) Preshipment inspection

A 1989 Background Note by the Secretariat on “Preshipment Inspection”⁸⁴ discusses the application of Article XX(d) in this connection.

6. Paragraph (g): “relating to the conservation of exhaustible natural resources”

(1) “relating to ... conservation”

In the 1988 Panel Report on “Canada - Measures Affecting Exports of Unprocessed Herring and Salmon”, the Panel examined the issue of whether export prohibitions of certain unprocessed salmon and unprocessed herring, conceded to be contrary to Article XI:1 of the General Agreement, were or were not justified by, inter alia, Article XX(g).

“... The Panel noted that both parties agreed that Canada maintains a variety of measures for the conservation of salmon and herring stocks and imposes limitations on the harvesting of salmon and herring. The Panel agreed with the parties that salmon and herring stocks are ‘exhaustible natural resources’ and the harvest limitations are ‘restrictions on domestic production’ within the meaning of Article XX(g). Having reached this conclusion the Panel examined whether the export prohibitions on certain unprocessed salmon and unprocessed herring are ‘relating to’ the conservation of salmon and herring stocks ...

“Article XX(g) does not state how the trade measures are to be related to the conservation and how they have to be conjoined with the production restrictions. This raises the question of whether any relationship with conservation and any conjunction with production restrictions are sufficient for a trade measure to fall under Article XX(g) or whether a particular relationship and conjunction are required. The Panel noted that the only previous case in which the CONTRACTING PARTIES took a decision on Article XX(g) was the case examined by the Panel on ‘United States - Prohibition of Imports of Tuna and Tuna Products from Canada’ but that that Panel had found that the party invoking Article XX(g) did not maintain restrictions on the production or consumption of tuna and thus had not been required to interpret the terms ‘relating to’ and ‘in conjunction with’.⁸⁵ The Panel therefore decided to analyze the meaning of these terms in the light of the context in which Article XX(g) appears in the General Agreement and in the light of the purpose of that provision.

⁸⁵The footnote to this sentence refers to 29S/91.

“The Panel noted that some of the subparagraphs of Article XX state that the measure must be ‘necessary’ or ‘essential’ to the achievement of the policy purpose set out in the provision (cf. subparagraphs (a), (b), (d) and (j)) while subparagraph (g) refers only to measures ‘relating to’ the conservation of exhaustible natural resources. This suggests that Article XX(g) does not only cover measures that are necessary or essential for the conservation of exhaustible natural resources but a wider range of measures. However, as the preamble of Article XX indicates, the purpose of including Article XX(g) in the General Agreement was not to widen the scope for measures serving trade policy purposes but merely to ensure that the commitments under the General Agreement do not hinder the pursuit of policies aimed at the conservation of exhaustible natural resources. The Panel concluded for these reasons that, while a trade measure did not have to be necessary or essential to the conservation of an exhaustible natural resource, it had to be primarily aimed at the conservation of an exhaustible natural resource to be considered as ‘relating to’ conservation within the meaning of Article XX(g). The Panel, similarly, considered that the terms ‘in conjunction with’ in Article XX(g) had to be interpreted in a way that ensures that the scope of possible actions under that provision corresponds to the purpose for which it was included in the General Agreement. A trade measure could therefore in the view of the Panel only be considered to be made effective ‘in conjunction with’ production restrictions if it was primarily aimed at rendering effective these restrictions.

“Having reached these conclusions the Panel examined whether the export prohibitions on unprocessed salmon and unprocessed herring maintained by Canada were primarily aimed at the conservation of salmon and herring stocks and rendering effective the restrictions on the harvesting of salmon and herring. The Panel noted Canada’s contention that the export prohibitions were not conservation measures per se but had an effect on conservation because they helped provide the statistical foundation for the harvesting restrictions and increase the benefits to the Canadian economy arising from the Salmonid Enhancement Program. The Panel carefully examined this contention and noted the following: Canada collects statistical data on many different species of fish, including certain salmon species, without imposing export prohibitions on them. Canada maintains statistics on all fish exports. If certain unprocessed salmon and unprocessed herring were exported, statistics on these exports would therefore be collected. The Salmonid Enhancement Program covers salmon species for which export prohibitions apply and other species not subject to export prohibitions. The export prohibitions do not limit access to salmon and herring supplies in general but only to certain salmon and herring supplies in unprocessed form. Canada limits purchases of these unprocessed fish only by foreign processors and consumers and not by domestic processors and consumers. In light of all these factors taken together, the Panel found that these prohibitions could not be deemed to be primarily aimed at the conservation of salmon and herring stocks and at rendering effective the restrictions on the harvesting of these fish. The Panel therefore concluded that the export prohibitions were not justified by Article XX(g).”⁸⁶

In the 1991 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna”, which has not been adopted, the Panel also examined whether the prohibition on imports of certain yellowfin tuna and certain yellowfin tuna products from Mexico and the provisions of the Marine Mammal Protection Act (MMPA) under which it was imposed could be justified under the exception in Article XX(g).

“... The Panel noted that the United States, in invoking Article XX(g) with respect to its direct import prohibition under the MMPA, had argued that the measures taken under the MMPA are measures primarily aimed at the conservation of dolphin, and that the import restrictions on certain tuna and tuna products under the MMPA are ‘primarily aimed at rendering effective restrictions on domestic production or consumption’ of dolphin. The Panel also noted that Mexico had argued that the United States measures were not justified under the exception in Article XX(g) because, inter alia, this provision could not be applied extrajurisdictionally.

“The Panel noted that Article XX(g) required that the measures relating to the conservation of exhaustible natural resources be taken ‘in conjunction with restrictions on domestic production or consumption’. A previous panel had found that a measure could only be considered to have been taken ‘in conjunction with’ production restrictions ‘if it was primarily aimed at rendering effective these restrictions’.⁸⁷ A country can effectively control the production or consumption of an exhaustible natural resource only to the extent that the production or consumption is under its jurisdiction. This suggests that Article XX(g) was intended to permit contracting parties to take trade measures primarily aimed at rendering effective restrictions on production or consumption within their jurisdiction.

“The Panel further noted that Article XX(g) allows each contracting party to adopt its own conservation policies. The conditions set out in Article XX(g) which limit resort to this exception, namely that the measures taken must be related to the conservation of exhaustible natural resources, and that they not ‘constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination ... or a disguised restriction on international trade’ refer to the trade measure requiring justification under Article XX(g), not however to the conservation policies adopted by the contracting party. The Panel considered that if the extrajurisdictional interpretation of Article XX(g) suggested by the United States were accepted, each contracting party could unilaterally determine the conservation policies from which other contracting parties could not deviate without jeopardizing their rights under the General Agreement. The considerations that led the Panel to reject an extrajurisdictional application of Article XX(b) therefore apply also to Article XX(g).

“The Panel did not consider that the United States measures, even if Article XX(g) could be applied extrajurisdictionally, would meet the conditions set out in that provision. A previous panel found that a measure could be considered as ‘relating to the conservation of exhaustible natural resources’ within the meaning of Article XX(g) only if it was primarily aimed at such conservation.⁸⁸ The Panel recalled that the United States linked the maximum incidental dolphin-taking rate which Mexico had to meet during a particular period in order to be able to export tuna to the United States to the taking rate actually recorded for United States fishermen during the same period. Consequently, the Mexican authorities could not know whether, at a given point of time, their conservation policies conformed to the United States conservation standards. The Panel considered that a limitation on trade based on such unpredictable conditions could not be regarded as being primarily aimed at the conservation of dolphins.

“On the basis of the above considerations, the Panel found that the United States direct import prohibition on certain yellowfin tuna and certain yellowfin tuna products of Mexico directly imported from Mexico, and the provisions of the MMPA under which it is imposed, could not be justified under Article XX(g).”⁸⁹

(3) “made effective in conjunction with restrictions on domestic production or consumption”

The US Draft Charter included an exception to the commercial policy chapter for “measures ... relating to the conservation of exhaustible natural resources if such measures are taken pursuant to international agreements or are made effective in conjunction with restrictions on domestic production and consumption” and a corresponding exception in the chapter on commodity agreements for “intergovernmental commodity agreements which appropriately relate to ... the conservation of reserves of exhaustible natural resources ... Provided that such agreements are not used to accomplish results inconsistent with the objectives of [the chapters on commodity agreements or restrictive business practices]”.⁹⁷ During the London session of the Preparatory Committee, the proposal was made to drop the proviso regarding restrictions on domestic consumption citing the case of a country with deposits of manganese, “which is very ample for our present and prospective domestic consumption but which is not very ample if we allow free exports of it”.⁹⁸ It was stated in response that “One of the ways in which export prohibitions could be used ... is for protective purposes. ... It is possible for a raw material producing country, which wishes to industrialize, to do so behind a protective arrangement which is extremely effective, and that is preventing anybody else getting the raw material to use in his already existing industries”.⁹⁹ The proposal was not accepted.¹⁰⁰

In the 1982 Panel Report on “United States - Prohibition of Imports of Tuna and Tuna Products from Canada” the Panel found that the import ban in question was inconsistent with Article XI:1 and not justified by Article XI:2(c), and examined the US argument that its measures were justified by Article XX(g).

“The Panel noted that the decision of the United States Government was based on Section 205 of the United States Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976. The Panel was informed that the purpose of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 was to ensure that certain stocks of fish were properly conserved and managed, to support and encourage the implementation and enforcement of international fishery agreements for the conservation and management of highly migratory species, and to encourage the negotiation and implementation of such additional agreements as necessary. It furthermore noted that Section 205 of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 contained provisions designed to discourage other countries from seeking to manage tuna unilaterally and from seizing United States fishing vessels which were fishing more than 12 miles off their coasts.

“The Panel also noted that the United States had applied limitations on the catch of some species of tuna (e.g. Pacific and Atlantic Yellowfin and Atlantic bluefin and bigeye), during the time the import prohibitions on tuna and tuna products from Canada had been in force. The Panel found, however, that even if an import restriction could, at least partly, have been necessary to the enforcement of measures taken to restrict the catches of certain tuna species, an import prohibition on all tuna and tuna products from Canada as applied by the United States from 31 August 1979 to 4 September 1980 would not sufficiently meet the requirements of Article XI:2, firstly because the measure applied to species for which the catch had not so far been restricted in the United States (such as albacore and skipjack) and secondly because it was maintained when restrictions on the catch were no longer maintained (e.g. Pacific yellowfin tuna in 1980). ...

“The Panel ... noted that both parties considered tuna stocks, including albacore tuna, to be an exhaustible natural resource in need of conservation management and that both parties were participating in international conventions aimed, inter alia, at a better conservation of such stocks. However, attention was drawn to the fact that Article XX(g) contained a qualification on measures relating to the conservation if they were to be justified under that Article, namely that such measures were made effective in conjunction with restrictions on domestic production or consumption.

“The Panel noted that the action taken by the United States applied to imports from Canada of all tuna and tuna products, and that the United States could at various times apply restrictions to species of tuna covered by the IATTC [Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission] and the ICCAT [International Convention for the Conservation of Atlantic Tunas]. However, restrictions on domestic production (catch) had so far been applied only to Pacific yellowfin tuna, from July to December 1979 under the Tuna Convention Act (related to the IATTC) and to Atlantic yellowfin tuna, bluefin tuna and bigeye tuna under the Atlantic Tunas Convention Act (related to the ICCAT), and no restrictions had been applied to the catch or landings of any other species of tuna, such as for instance albacore.

“The Panel also noted that the United States representative had provided no evidence that domestic consumption of tuna and tuna products had been restricted in the United States.

“The Panel could therefore not accept it to be justified that the United States prohibition of imports of all tuna and tuna products from Canada as applied from 31 August 1979 to 4 September 1980, had been made effective in conjunction with restrictions on United States domestic production or consumption on all tuna and tuna products”.¹⁰¹

In the 1988 Panel Report on “Canada - Measures Affecting Exports of Unprocessed Herring and Salmon”,

“... The Panel noted that both parties agreed that Canada maintains a variety of measures for the conservation of salmon and herring stocks and imposes limitations on the harvesting of salmon and herring. The Panel agreed with the parties that ... the harvest limitations [are] ‘restrictions on domestic production’ within the meaning of Article XX(g)”.¹⁰²

A Secretariat Note of 1991 on “Trade and Environment” includes a list of quantitative restrictions for which Article XX(g) has been cited as a justification. The list was drawn from the Inventory of Quantitative Restrictions maintained by the Secretariat.¹⁰³

7. Paragraph (h): “undertaken in pursuance of obligations under [a] commodity agreement”

In order for a measure to be covered by Article XX(h) and the Interpretative Note Ad Article XX(h), the intergovernmental agreement in question must: (a) conform to criteria submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES and not disapproved by them; (b) be itself submitted and not disapproved; or (c) conform to the principles approved by the Economic and Social Council in its Resolution 30(IV) of 28 March 1947.

The US Draft Charter provided for a chapter on commodity policy, and therefore its article on elimination of quantitative restrictions provided for an exception for “export or import quotas imposed under inter-governmental commodity agreements concluded in accordance with the provisions of Chapter VI.” The London Report notes that “There was general agreement that ... import or export quotas imposed under inter-governmental commodity agreements concluded under the Charter might be used”¹⁰⁴ and accordingly the London and New York Draft Charters provided for such an exception in Article 25:2 (corresponding to GATT Article XI:2). The London Report also notes that it was agreed that an exception from the general rule of non-discrimination in quantitative restrictions was necessary where “Some element of discrimination in import and export restrictions may be needed in order to carry out inter-governmental commodity agreements under the commodity policy provisions of the Charter ...".¹⁰⁵

The Preparatory Committee at its London session adopted a resolution noting that governments were already taking action on the lines proposed in the Charter chapter on commodity agreements, and requesting the United Nations to appoint an Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements.¹⁰⁶ In response, the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations on 28 March 1947 adopted ECOSOC Resolution 30(IV), as follows:

"The Economic and Social Council,

"Noting that inter-governmental consultations are going forward actively with respect to certain internationally traded commodities, and

"Considering the significant measure of agreement regarding commodity problems and the co-ordination of commodity consultations already reached both in the First Session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, and in the Preparatory Commission on World Food Proposals of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations:

"Recommends that, pending the establishment of the International Trade Organization, Members of the United Nations adopt as a general guide in inter-governmental consultation or action with respect to commodity problems the principles laid down in Chapter VII as a whole - i.e., the chapter on inter-governmental commodity arrangements of the draft Charter appended to the Report of the First Session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment - although recognizing that discussion in future sessions of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference, as well as in the Conference itself, may result in modifications of the provisions relating to commodity arrangements, and

"Requests the Secretary-General to appoint an interim co-ordinating committee for international commodity arrangements to keep informed of and to facilitate by appropriate means such inter-governmental consultation or action with respect to commodity problems, the committee to consist of a chairman to represent the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, a person nominated by the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations to be concerned in particular with agricultural primary commodities, and a person to be concerned in particular with non-agricultural primary commodities."¹⁰⁷

During discussions at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, it was agreed that the exception for measures under commodity agreements should be applicable to all provisions of the commercial policy chapter of the Charter. Accordingly, the article on general exceptions to the commercial policy chapter was amended to insert an exception for measures undertaken in pursuance of obligations under intergovernmental commodity agreements concluded in accordance with the Charter chapter on such agreements.¹⁰⁸ The rationale behind this change was stated as follows:

"... the implication is that the only exceptions to Chapter V which would be necessitated by the provisions of any possible commodity arrangement would be the use of quotas. We venture to doubt that and think that it would be wrong for the Charter to express the thought that the only way of dealing with the commodity problem is by a quota scheme. ... There is also the point that one can easily think of exceptions which might be needed under other Articles. I might mention one, and that is Article 31

[XVII] which is headed ‘Non-discriminatory administration of state-trading enterprises’. Clearly, if the State were a party to a commodity arrangement and it were also a trader in that commodity, it would be bound to give precedence in its state-trading operations to the provisions of the commodity arrangement into which it had entered, and not so much to the considerations to which its attention is directed by Paragraph 1 of Article 31.”¹⁰⁹

Thus, in the General Agreement as concluded 30 October 1947, paragraph (h) (Article XX:I(h)) provided an exception for measures “undertaken in pursuance of obligations under intergovernmental commodity agreements, conforming to the principles approved by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations in its Resolution of March 28, 1947, establishing an Interim Co-ordinating Committee for International Commodity Arrangements”. The “principles” referred to in the ECOSOC Resolution are, as noted above, those of the Charter chapter on commodity agreements, which became in due course Chapter VI of the Havana Charter. Chapter VI of the Charter provided for intergovernmental commodity agreements with respect to “primary commodities”, defined as “any product of farm, forest or fishery or any mineral, in its natural form or which has undergone such processing as is customarily required to prepare it for marketing in substantial volume in international trade”.¹¹⁰ Chapter VI also provided certain general principles and procedural requirements for agreements concluded thereunder.

Article XXIX:1 of the General Agreement provides that the contracting parties “undertake to observe to the fullest extent of their executive authority the general principles of Chapters I to VI inclusive ... of the Havana Charter”. A proposal to give provisional effect to Chapter VI of the Havana Charter pending entry into force of the Charter was submitted to the Executive Committee of ICITO when it met at Annecy on 22 July 1949. A Working Party prepared a proposal which was not acted upon.¹¹¹

During the Review Session of 1954-55, paragraph (h) was examined in the Review Working Party on Organizational and Functional Arrangements in the context of the question of the GATT’s involvement in the area of commodity trade generally, and in the context of an ECOSOC Resolution of 5 August 1954 establishing the Advisory Commission on International Trade with some of the responsibilities formerly assigned to ICCICA.¹¹² Certain delegations sought insertion into the General Agreement of provisions on the lines of Chapter VI of the Charter.

In response, a separate Working Party on Commodity Problems was established and met during the Review Session to consider “specific proposals for principles and objectives to govern international action designed to overcome problems arising in the field of international trade in primary commodities and the form of an international agreement necessary to administer and apply those principles; ... the relationship between the parties to such an agreement with, on the one hand, the CONTRACTING PARTIES and, on the other hand, with any other international organizations exercising responsibilities in the field of international trade in primary commodities ...”.¹¹³ The Working Party drafted a Special Agreement on Commodity Arrangements containing “general principles governing provisions of all commodity arrangements” and setting out procedural and institutional provisions for dealing with commodity agreements. The draft Agreement contemplated the negotiation of agreements among governments, the implementing measures for which would possibly conflict with GATT obligations unless provision were made. It was envisaged that the GATT and the proposed Special Agreement would be linked by an amendment to Article XX:I(h).¹¹⁴ Discussions concerning this draft during the Review Session did not result in consensus, and the Working Party was held over to the Tenth Session.¹¹⁵

¹¹⁰This same definition was used for the (linked) Charter obligations with regard to export subsidies on primary commodities, and is utilized in the definition of “primary products” in paragraph 2 of the note ad Section B of Article XVI of the General Agreement (also referred to in the interpretative note to Article XXXVI:4). Meanwhile, in the context of the Review it had been agreed to amend Article XX. The Report of the Review Working Party on “Organizational and Functional Arrangements” notes as follows:

“The Working Party felt that, in view of the steps being taken to develop new principles relating to the conclusion of commodity agreements, Article XX:I(h) required amendment. Accordingly, the Working Party recommends the substitution for the existing sub-paragraph of the Article of a new text. The Working Party considered that Article XX:I(h) does not itself establish principles for the conclusion of commodity agreements, but stipulates conditions under which measures taken pursuant to commodity agreements may be excepted from the provisions of the General Agreement ...

“In order that the exception provided for in the present Article XX:I(h) might continue to apply to commodity agreements concluded or which may be concluded, in accordance with the principles approved by the Economic and Social Council in its Resolution of 28 March 1947, the Working Party recommends that an Interpretative Note be added to the amended Article.”¹¹⁶

The interpretative note to Article XX(h) states: “The exception provided by this sub-paragraph extends to any commodity agreement which conforms to the principles approved by the Economic and Social Council in its Resolution 30(IV) of 28 March 1947.”

At the Tenth Session in the fall of 1955, discussions on commodity issues continued. The Working Party on Commodity Problems submitted a final report which included the draft Special Agreement “with the recommendation of the Working Party that subject as far as possible to resolution of outstanding differences, it be accepted by them as embodying the criteria to which intergovernmental commodity arrangements should conform in order to benefit from the exception provided in the first part of paragraph (h) of Article XX of the General Agreement as revised at the Ninth Session. The Working Party assumes, that, if the CONTRACTING PARTIES find this Agreement satisfactory for that purpose, they will record their intention of recognizing formally when the revised GATT comes into effect that the Agreement has been considered under Article XX(h) and not disapproved.”¹¹⁷ However, due to differences of view concerning various issues, the Working Party report and its draft Agreement were not adopted, and the issue was deferred to the Eleventh Session.¹¹⁸ At the Eleventh Session in the fall of 1956, it was recognized that it was unlikely that agreement could be reached on the lines of the draft Special Agreement. Instead, an alternative approach was adopted, embodied in the Resolution of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on “Particular Difficulties connected with Trade in Primary Commodities”¹¹⁹ which focused on general multilateral review, problem-specific consultations and the possible convening of an intergovernmental meeting on a case-by-case basis. The Working Party Report on “Particular Difficulties connected with Trade in Primary Commodities” notes that

“The Working Party gave consideration to the question whether the Resolution should include a statement of objectives to be sought and principles to be applied in inter-governmental commodity arrangements. The view was widely held in the Working Party that such objectives and principles would need to take into account the circumstances of the particular commodity agreement under negotiation and should, therefore, be left to each negotiating conference subject, so far as the contracting parties are concerned, to any review by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in accordance with the relevant provisions of the General Agreement”.¹²⁰

In response to arguments that commodity matters lay outside the competence of GATT, the CONTRACTING PARTIES ruled at the Tenth Session in 1955 that they were competent, pursuant to Article XXV:1, to deal with commodity problems.¹²² This view was confirmed in subsequent reports on commodity trade problems.

Article XXXVIII:2(a), which was added to the General Agreement by the 1965 Part IV Protocol, provides that the CONTRACTING PARTIES “shall ... where appropriate, take action, including action through international arrangements, to provide improved and acceptable conditions of access to world markets for primary products of particular interest to less-developed contracting parties and to devise measures designed to stabilize and improve conditions of world markets in these products including measures designed to attain stable, equitable and remunerative prices for exports of such products”. See also the corresponding provisions in Article XXXVI:4.

A Memorandum of Agreement on Basic Elements for the Negotiation of a World Grains Arrangement is attached to the Geneva (1967) Protocol to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.¹²³ The International Grains Arrangement, consisting of a Wheat Trade Convention and a Food Aid Convention, was negotiated under the auspices of the International Wheat Council in cooperation between the FAO and UNCTAD in 1967, and has expired. The Arrangement Regarding Bovine Meat¹²⁴ and the International Dairy Arrangement¹²⁵ were negotiated during the Tokyo Round of multilateral trade negotiations.

A Secretariat Note of 1991 on “Trade and Environment” includes a list of quantitative restrictions for which Article XX(h) has been cited as a justification. The list was drawn from the Inventory of Quantitative Restrictions maintained by the Secretariat.¹²⁶

No contracting party has ever submitted a complaint under Articles XXII or XXIII that a measure taken in pursuance of a commodity agreement was inconsistent with the General Agreement, and no commodity agreement has ever been formally submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XX(h).

8. Paragraph (i)

This paragraph was proposed by New Zealand at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee in 1947. New Zealand explained it as follows:

“The purpose of this amendment is to provide for the case of countries like New Zealand which maintain as a matter of permanent policy price stabilization schemes covering, generally, the whole range of their economy. Any country which, like New Zealand, stabilizes its general price levels is faced with the problem that the world price for certain commodities, particularly raw materials which it exports, will be substantially higher than the stabilized domestic price for the like commodity.

“The best way of explaining that is, I think, to give a practical example. In New Zealand the price of leather to domestic users such as, for instance, the footwear industry is sold at a price very much below the world level. Now, in the circumstances it becomes necessary to ensure, by means of export controls, that the local requirements of leather are satisfied - otherwise, if that is not done, there would be no leather for the local market or, alternatively, it would be necessary to let the local price of leather rise to the world level. We do not assume that it would be contemplated that the effect of the Charter would be to compel the abandonment of the price stabilization schemes, and therefore we have brought forward this amendment. It is true that it has been suggested that the same result can be achieved by the method of export taxes, but we, and I think other countries who have tried that method, have found it unsatisfactory and, indeed, impracticable, because the world price of primary commodities is subject to such wide variations that the rate of tax has to be varied too frequently".¹²⁷

During the discussion of this proposal, it was "pointed out that the provision only applied in cases where a general scheme of internal price stabilization was in operation, and it could not be used to afford protection to national industry by a country which had no such plan".¹²⁸ The various concerns expressed at the danger of abuse in the utilization of this exception clause led to the addition of the proviso contained in the second part of paragraph (i).

The 1950 Report of the Working Party on "The Use of Quantitative Restrictions for Protective and Other Commercial Purposes"¹²⁹ examined, inter alia, the use of export restrictions on raw materials to promote a domestic fabricating industry.

"... The Working Party took note of the fact that since the exemption provided for in [Article XX(i)] referred to export restrictions associated with a governmental stabilization plan, and not to the plan itself, the various provisos listed in [Article XX(i)] were meant to apply only to the export restrictions and not to other aspects of such a plan.

"The Working Party concluded that the Agreement does not permit the imposition of restrictions upon the export of a raw material in order to protect or promote a domestic industry, whether by affording a price advantage to that industry for the purchase of its materials, or by reducing the supply of such materials available to foreign competitors, or by other means. However, it was agreed that the question of the objective of any given export restriction would have to be determined on the basis of the facts in each individual case.

"There was some discussion of certain cases in which, on the one hand, a country would be maintaining export restrictions on a raw material which had the effect of assisting a domestic industry processing that material, and on the other hand would be maintaining a prohibition or a severe restriction on imports of the finished product. There was general agreement that in such a case a contracting party, in considering whether the export restrictions were justified by [Article XX(i)], would have to give close examination to the question whether these export restrictions in fact operated to increase the protection afforded to the domestic industry".¹³⁰

9. Paragraph (j)

(1) "local short supply"

The report on discussions in the London session of the Preparatory Committee notes that "The Preparatory Committee agreed that during a post-war transitional period it should be permissible to use [quantitative] restrictions to achieve the equitable distribution of products in short supply, the orderly maintenance of war-time price control by countries undergoing shortages as a result of the war, and the orderly liquidation of temporary surpluses of government-owned stocks and of industries, which were set up owing to the exigencies of war, but which it would be uneconomic to maintain in normal times. ... all these exceptions would be limited to a specified post-war transitional period, which might, however, be subject to some extension in particular cases".¹³¹ These three situations were provided for in Article 25:2 of the London and New York Drafts of the Charter (corresponding to GATT Article XI:2).

During the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, it was decided to move these three postwar temporary exceptions to Article 43 (general exceptions to the commercial policy chapter) as a new second part of Article 43. Measures of these three types were to be removed in principle not later than 1 January 1951; it was stated that “The effect of this would be to permit during the transitional period the use of differential internal taxes and mixing regulations as well as quantitative restrictions in order to distribute goods in short supply, to give effect to price controls based on shortages and to liquidate surplus stocks or uneconomic industries carried over from the war period”.¹³² Accordingly, Article XX in the 30 October 1947 text of the General Agreement included a Part II consisting of three paragraphs corresponding to the three situations noted above. Paragraph XX:II(a) provided for measures “essential to the acquisition or distribution of products in general or local short supply; Provided that any such measures shall be consistent with any multilateral arrangements directed to an equitable international distribution of such products or, in the absence of such arrangements, with the principle that all contracting parties are entitled to an equitable share of the international supply of such products”.

It was stated during the course of the discussion at Geneva in 1947 that the phrase “general or local short supply” was “understood to include cases where a product, although in international short supply, was not necessarily in short supply in all markets throughout the world. It was not used in the sense that every country importing a commodity was in short supply otherwise it would not be importing it”.¹³³

Part II of Article XX further provided that “Measures instituted or maintained under part II of this Article which are inconsistent with the other provisions of this Agreement shall be removed as soon as the conditions giving rise to them have ceased, and in any event not later than January 1, 1951; Provided that this period may, with the concurrence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, be extended in respect of the application of any particular measure to any particular product by any particular contracting party for such further periods as the CONTRACTING PARTIES may specify”.

At the Fifth Session in 1950, it was decided to prolong the validity of all three paragraphs of Article XX:II until 1 January 1952, by a decision under Article XXV:5 waiving until that date the obligation of contracting parties instituting or maintaining measures under part II of Article XX to discontinue them or seek permission for their continuance.¹³⁴ Further such decisions extended this waiver until 1 January 1954¹³⁵ and 1 July 1955¹³⁶. In the Review Session of 1954-55, it was agreed that the substance of paragraph (a) of Section II should be retained for the time being, subject to review not later than 30 June 1960, but that the remainder of paragraph XX:II should be deleted.¹³⁷ A Resolution on “Liquidation of Strategic Stocks” was also adopted.¹³⁸ The Report of the Review Working Party on “Other Barriers to Trade” notes in this connection:

“In connexion with the proposed suppression of Section II of Article XX, one member of the Working Party made the point that the need for the exception in Section II(b) was not limited to shortages subsequent to the war, but might be needed in the event of a natural catastrophe. The Working Party considered, however, that other provisions of the Agreement were adequate to cover the application of restrictions when required by any natural catastrophe, and therefore did not consider it necessary to retain or amend the exception in Section II(b)”.¹³⁹

Section II(a) then became paragraph (j) of Article XX. This change was effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement and entered into effect on 7 October 1957.

In 1949, Czechoslovakia complained that export restrictions applied by the United States discriminated against Czechoslovakia because the export licensing system favoured countries in the European Recovery Program (the OEEC area). The United States stated that these measures were consistent with Article XXI, and also stated that they were consistent with the short-supply exception in Article XX which required “that any controls exercised to promote the distribution of commodities in short supply shall be consistent with any multilateral arrangements directed to an equitable international distribution of such products”.¹⁴⁰

The 1950 Report of the Working Party on “The Use of Quantitative Restrictions for Protective and Other Commercial Purposes”¹⁴¹ also examined the use of export restrictions for short-supply items under then-Article XX:II(a).

“... The Working Party discussed the proviso ... requiring the observation of the principle of equitable shares for all contracting parties in the distribution of the international supply of a product in local or general short supply, and noted that the word ‘equitable’ is used in Article XX:II(a) and not the word ‘non-discriminatory’ which is used in Article XIII.

“In respect of this type of restriction, general agreement existed on the following statements:

“(a) Apart from situations to which the provisions of Article XX:II(a) are applicable, the practice referred to is inconsistent with the provisions of the Agreement.

“(b) Although the requirement of Article XX:II(a) relates to the total international supply and not the supply of an individual contracting party, nevertheless if a contracting party divert an excessive share of its own supply to individual countries (which may or may not be contracting parties) this may well defeat the principle that all contracting parties are entitled to an equitable share of the international supply of such a product.

“(c) What would not be regarded as an equitable share if it were the result of a unilateral allotment by a contracting party could not appropriately be defended as equitable within the meaning of Article XX:II(a) simply because it had been the consequence of an agreement between two contracting parties.

“(d) The determination of what is ‘equitable’ to all the contracting parties in any given set of circumstances will depend upon the facts in those circumstances.”¹⁴²

(2) “The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall review the need for this sub-paragraph”

When the need for paragraph (j) was reviewed at the Sixteenth Session in 1960, the CONTRACTING PARTIES noted “that the contracting parties have resorted to the provisions of this sub-paragraph in a relatively limited number of cases and that it is generally recognized that it would be appropriate to retain such provisions to enable contracting parties to meet emergency situations which may arise in the future”. It was decided to retain the paragraph and to review the matter again in 1965.¹⁴³ At the Twenty-second Session in 1965, the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided that paragraph (j) “should be retained for the time being” and to review the need for it again in 1970.¹⁴⁴ At the Twenty-sixth Session in 1970, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a recommendation of the Council that paragraph (j) be retained with no provision for further review.¹⁴⁵

B. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE XX AND OTHER ARTICLES OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT

1. Article III

The 1983 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies” examined the consistency of Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 and its application to the imports of certain spring assemblies from Canada with Articles III and XX(d). The Panel found Article XX(d) to apply and “considered that an examination of the United States action in the light of the other GATT provisions referred to ... was not required”.¹⁴⁷ This Panel Report was adopted subject to an understanding that its adoption “shall not foreclose future examination of the use of Section 337 to deal with patent infringement cases from the point of view of consistency with Articles III and XX of the General Agreement”.¹⁴⁸

The 1989 Panel on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” found, concerning the relation between Article III and Article XX(d):

“The Panel noted that Article XX is entitled ‘General Exceptions’ and that the central phrase in the introductory clause reads: ‘nothing in this Agreement shall be construed to prevent the adoption or enforcement ... of measures ...’. Article XX(d) thus provides for a limited and conditional exception from obligations under other provisions. The Panel therefore concluded that Article XX(d) applies only to measures inconsistent with another provision of the General Agreement, and that, consequently, the application of Section 337 has to be examined first in the light of Article III:4. If any inconsistencies with Article III:4 were found, the Panel would then examine whether they could be justified under Article XX(d)”.¹⁴⁹

The 1990 Panel on “Thailand - Restrictions on Importation of and Internal Taxes on Cigarettes” referred to the use of non-discriminatory measures consistent with Article III in interpreting the scope of “necessary” measures under Article XX(b); see page 566 above.

2. Articles XXII and XXIII

In discussions of the article on exceptions to the commercial policy chapter of the Charter in the London Session of the Preparatory Committee, it was stated in relation to Article 30 of the draft Charter [XXII and XXIII] that “one of the main objectives of Article 30 was to prevent evasion of the provisions of Chapter IV. If a Member country used the exceptions of sub-paragraph (b) [XX(b)] as a means of protection, Article 30 provided that another Member might make representations to the ITO and so obtain satisfaction. It was almost impossible to draft exceptions which could not be abused, if good faith was lacking. The League of Nations had adopted an Article on the lines of Article 30, precisely because they had been unable to formulate exceptions which would exclude all possibility of abuse”.¹⁵⁰

3. Article XXIV

In 1987, during the Working Party on the Accession of Portugal and Spain to the EEC, in response to a question regarding an EEC regulation permitting the use of the term “sherry” to describe certain liqueur wines of the United Kingdom, Ireland and Cyprus but not liqueur wines of South Africa, the EEC stated that the regulation in question “constitutes a measure designed to prevent deceptive practices. It is therefore justified under Article XX(d) of the General Agreement” and that the preferential treatment of certain products was “consistent with the GATT by virtue of Article XXIV, which permits customs unions to be formed in accordance with the needs of the integration process they plan to carry out”.¹⁵¹

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

Provisions corresponding to those in Article XX appear in the US Proposals in Chapter III-G; in the US Draft Charter in Article 32; in the London and New York Drafts, in Article 37; in the Geneva Draft in Article 43; and in the Havana Charter in Article 45. In each of these drafts these provisions were exceptions to the commercial policy provisions of the Charter. Separate policy-based exceptions were provided for the Charter chapters on commodity agreements and restrictive business practices.

The article on commercial policy exceptions originally included four national security provisions which were separated during the Geneva session of the preparatory committee and became exceptions to all obligations in the Charter; see Section III under Article XXI.

At Havana, an exception was added for measures “necessary to the enforcement of laws and regulations relating to public safety”, which term, in the view of the drafters, included the legal concept of “public order” (“ordre public”).¹⁵² In addition, an exception was added for measures “taken in pursuance of any intergovernmental agreement which relates solely to the conservation of fisheries resources, migratory birds or wild animals”, as a corollary to a similar provision added to Article 70, the exceptions provision in the chapter on commodity agreements.¹⁵³ The Working Party on “Modifications to the General Agreement”, which met during the Second Session in September 1948 and considered which of the changes made at Havana should be brought into the text of the General Agreement, did not decide to take either of these changes into the General Agreement.

See above at pages 589 and 593 concerning the amendments to sub-paragraph (h) and Section II of Article XX agreed during the Review Session of 1954-55. These changes were effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, which entered into force on 7 October 1957.

Article XXI

Security Exceptions

Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed

- (a) to require any contracting party to furnish any information the disclosure of which it considers contrary to its essential security interests; or
- (b) to prevent any contracting party from taking any action which it considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests
 - (i) relating to fissionable materials or the materials from which they are derived;
 - (ii) relating to the traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war and to such traffic in other goods and materials as is carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying a military establishment;
 - (iii) taken in time of war or other emergency in international relations; or
- (c) to prevent any contracting party from taking any action in pursuance of its obligations under the United Nations Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXI

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXI

1. Paragraphs (a) and (b): “it considers ... essential security interests”

During discussions in the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, in response to an inquiry as to the meaning of “essential security interests”, it was stated by one of the drafters of the original Draft Charter that “We gave a good deal of thought to the question of the security exception which we thought should be included in the Charter. We recognized that there was a great danger of having too wide an exception and we could not put it into the Charter, simply by saying: ‘by any Member of measures relating to a Member’s security interests,’ because that would permit anything under the sun. Therefore we thought it well to draft provisions which would take care of real security interests and, at the same time, so far as we could, to limit the exception so as to prevent the adoption of protection for maintaining industries under every conceivable circumstance. ... there must be some latitude here for security measures. It is really a question of balance. We have got to have some exceptions. We cannot make it too tight, because we cannot prohibit measures which are needed purely for security reasons. On the other hand, we cannot make it so broad that, under the guise of security, countries will put on measures which really have a commercial purpose”. The Chairman of Commission A suggested in response that the spirit in which Members of the Organization would interpret these provisions was the only guarantee against abuses of this kind.¹

During the discussion of the complaint of Czechoslovakia at the Third Session in 1949 (see page 602) it was stated, inter alia, that “every country must be the judge in the last resort on questions relating to its own security. On the other hand, every contracting party should be cautious not to take any step which might have the effect of undermining the General Agreement”.²

In 1961, on the occasion of the accession of Portugal, Ghana stated that its boycott of Portuguese goods was justified under the provisions of Article XXI:(b)(iii), noting that “... under this Article each contracting party was the sole judge of what was necessary in its essential security interest. There could therefore be no objection to Ghana regarding the boycott of goods as justified by security interests. It might be observed that a country’s security interests might be threatened by a potential as well as an actual danger. The Ghanaian Government’s view was that the situation in Angola was a constant threat to the peace of the African continent and that any action which, by bringing pressure to bear on the Portuguese Government, might lead to a lessening of this danger, was therefore justified in the essential security interests of Ghana”.³

During the Council discussion in 1982 of trade restrictions applied for non-economic reasons by the EEC, its member States, Canada and Australia against imports from Argentina (see page 603), the representative of the EEC stated that “the EEC and its member States had taken certain measures on the basis of their inherent rights, of which Article XXI of the General Agreement was a reflection. The exercise of these rights constituted a general exception, and required neither notification, justification nor approval, a procedure confirmed by thirty-five years of implementation of the General Agreement. He said that in effect, this procedure showed that every contracting party was - in the last resort - the judge of its exercise of these rights”. The representative of Canada stated that “Canada’s sovereign action was to be seen as a political response to a political issue ... Canada was convinced that the situation which had necessitated the measures had to be satisfactorily resolved by appropriate action elsewhere, as the GATT had neither the competence nor the responsibility to deal with the political issue which had been raised. His delegation could not, therefore, accept the notion that there had been a violation of the General Agreement”.⁴ The representative of Australia “stated that the Australian measures were in conformity with the provisions of Article XXI:(c), which did not require notification or justification”.⁵ The representative of the United States stated that “The General Agreement left to each contracting party the judgment as to what it considered to be necessary to protect its security interests. The CONTRACTING PARTIES had no power to question that judgement".⁶

The representative of Argentina noted that it had attempted to submit to GATT only the trade aspects of this case and stated "that in order to justify restrictive measures a contracting party invoking Article XXI would specifically be required to state reasons of national security ... there were no trade restrictions which could be applied without being notified, discussed and justified".⁷

Paragraph 7(iii) of the Ministerial Declaration adopted 29 November 1982 at the Thirty-eighth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provides that "... the contracting parties undertake, individually and jointly: ... to abstain from taking restrictive trade measures, for reasons of a non-economic character, not consistent with the General Agreement".⁸

The question of whether and to what extent the CONTRACTING PARTIES can review the national security reasons for measures taken under Article XXI was discussed again in the GATT Council in May and July 1985 in relation to the US trade embargo against Nicaragua which had taken effect on 7 May 1985.⁹ While a panel was established to examine the US measures, its terms of reference stated that "the Panel cannot examine or judge the validity or motivation for the invocation of Article XXI(b)(iii) by the United States".¹⁰ In the Panel Report on "United States - Trade Measures affecting Nicaragua", which has not been adopted,

"... The Panel noted that, while both parties to the dispute agreed that the United States, by imposing the embargo, had acted contrary to certain trade-facilitating provisions of the General Agreement, they disagreed on the question of whether the non-observance of these provisions was justified by Article XXI(b)(iii) ...

"The Panel further noted that, in the view of Nicaragua, this provision should be interpreted in the light of the basic principles of international law and in harmony with the decisions of the United Nations and of the International Court of Justice and should therefore be regarded as merely providing contracting parties subjected to an aggression with the right of self-defence. The Panel also noted that, in the view of the United States, Article XXI applied to any action which the contracting party taking it considered necessary for the protection of its essential security interests and that the Panel, both by the terms of Article XXI and by its mandate, was precluded from examining the validity of the United States' invocation of Article XXI.

"The Panel did not consider the question of whether the terms of Article XXI precluded it from examining the validity of the United States' invocation of that Article as this examination was precluded by its mandate. It recalled that its terms of reference put strict limits on its activities because they stipulated that the Panel could not examine or judge the validity of or the motivation for the invocation of Article XXI(b)(iii) by the United States ... The Panel concluded that, as it was not authorized to examine the justification for the United States' invocation of a general exception to the obligations under the General Agreement, it could find the United States neither to be complying with its obligations under the General Agreement nor to be failing to carry out its obligations under that Agreement".¹¹

2. Paragraph (a): "furnish ... any information"

During the discussion at the Third Session of a Czechoslovak complaint concerning United States national security export controls, in response to a request by Czechoslovakia for information under Article XIII:3 on the export licensing system concerned, the US representative stated that while it would comply with a substantial part of the request, "Article XXI ... provides that a contracting party shall not be required to give information which it considers contrary to its essential security interests. The United States does consider it contrary to its security interest - and to the security interest of other friendly countries - to reveal the names of the commodities that it considers to be most strategic".¹²

The "Decision Concerning Article XXI of the General Agreement" of 30 November 1982 (see page 605 below) provides inter alia that "Subject to the exception in Article XXI:a, contracting parties should be informed to the fullest extent possible of trade measures taken under Article XXI".¹³

3. Paragraph (b): "action"

(1) "relating to fissionable materials or the materials from which they are derived"

The records of the Geneva discussions of the Preparatory Committee indicate that the representative of Australia withdrew its reservation on the inclusion of a reference to "fissionable materials" in the light of a statement that the provisions of Article 35 [XXIII] would apply to Article XXI; see below at page 606.¹⁴

(2) "relating to the traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war and to such traffic in other goods and materials as is carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying a military establishment"

During discussions in the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, in connection with a proposal to modify Article 37(g) [XX(g)] to permit export restrictions on raw materials for long-term defense purposes, the question was put whether the phrase "for the purpose of supplying a military establishment" would permit restrictions on the export of iron ore when it was believed that the ore would be used by ordinary smelting works and ultimately for military purposes by another country. It was stated in response that "if a Member exporting commodities is satisfied that the purpose of the transaction was to supply a military establishment, immediately or ultimately, this language would cover it".¹⁵

At the Third Session in 1949, Czechoslovakia requested a decision under Article XXIII as to whether the US had failed to carry out its obligations under Articles I and XIII, by reason of the 1948 US administration of its export licensing controls (both short-supply controls and new export controls instituted in 1948 discriminating between destination countries for security reasons). The US stated that its controls for security reasons applied to a narrow group of exports of goods which could be used for military purposes¹⁶ and also stated that "the provisions of Article I would not require uniformity of formalities, as applied to different countries, in respect of restrictions imposed for security reasons".¹⁷ It was also stated by one contracting party that "goods which were of a nature that could contribute to war potential" came within the exception of Article XXI.¹⁸ The complaint was rejected by a roll-call vote of 17 to 1 with 3 abstentions.¹⁹

(3) "taken in time of war or other emergency in international relations"

The 1970 Working Party Report on "Accession of the United Arab Republic" notes that in response to concerns raised regarding the Arab League boycott against Israel and the secondary boycott against firms having relations with Israel, the representative of the UAR stated that "the history of the Arab boycott was beyond doubt related to the extraordinary circumstances to which the Middle East area had been exposed. The state of war which had long prevailed in that area necessitated the resorting to this system. ... In view of the political character of this issue, the United Arab Republic did not wish to discuss it within GATT. ... It would not be reasonable to ask that the United Arab Republic should do business with a firm that transferred all or part of its profits from sales to the United Arab Republic to an enemy country".²⁰ Several members of the working party supported the views of the representative of the UAR that the background of the boycott measures was political and not commercial.²¹

In November 1975 Sweden introduced a global import quota system for certain footwear. The Swedish Government considered that the measure was taken in conformity with the spirit of Article XXI and stated, inter alia, that the “decrease in domestic production has become a critical threat to the emergency planning of Sweden’s economic defence as an integral part of the country’s security policy. This policy necessitates the maintenance of a minimum domestic production capacity in vital industries. Such a capacity is indispensable in order to secure the provision of essential products necessary to meet basic needs in case of war or other emergency in international relations”.²² In the discussion of this measure in the GATT Council, “Many representatives ... expressed doubts as to the justification of these measures under the General Agreement ... Many delegations reserved their rights under the GATT and took note of Sweden’s offer to consult”.²³ Sweden notified the termination of the quotas as far as leather and plastic shoes were concerned as of 1 July 1977.²⁴

In April 1982, the EEC and its member states, Canada, and Australia suspended indefinitely imports into their territories of products of Argentina. In notifying these measures they stated that “they have taken certain measures in the light of the situation addressed in the Security Council Resolution 502 [the Falkland/Malvinas issue]; they have taken these measures on the basis of their inherent rights of which Article XXI of the General Agreement is a reflection”.²⁵ Argentina took the position that, in addition to infringing the principles and objectives underlying the GATT, these measures were in violation of Articles I:1, II, XI:1, XIII, and Part IV. The legal aspects of these trade restrictions affecting Argentina were discussed extensively in the Council.²⁶ The measures were removed in June 1982. Argentina sought an interpretation of Article XXI; these efforts led to the inclusion of paragraph 7(iii) in the Ministerial Declaration of November 1982, which provides that “... the contracting parties undertake, individually and jointly: ... to abstain from taking restrictive trade measures, for reasons of a non-economic character, not consistent with the General Agreement”²⁷ and also led to the adoption of the text below at page 605.

On 7 May 1985 the US notified the contracting parties of an Executive Order prohibiting all imports of goods and services of Nicaraguan origin, all exports from the US of goods to or destined for Nicaragua (except those destined for the organized democratic resistance) and transactions relating thereto.²⁸ In Council discussions of this matter, Nicaragua stated that these measures contravened Articles I, II, V, XI, XIII and Part IV of the GATT, and that “this was not a matter of national security but one of coercion”.²⁹ Nicaragua further stated that Article XXI could not be applied in an arbitrary fashion; there had to be some correspondence between the measures adopted and the situation giving rise to such adoption.³⁰ Nicaragua stated that the text of Article XXI made it clear that the CONTRACTING PARTIES were competent to judge whether a situation of “war or other emergency in international relations” existed and requested that a Panel be set up under Article XXIII:2 to examine the issue.³¹ The United States stated that its actions had been taken for national security reasons and were covered by Article XXI(b)(iii) of the GATT; and that this provision left it to each contracting party to judge what action it considered necessary for the protection of its essential security interest.³² The terms of reference of the Panel precluded it from examining or judging the validity of the invocation of Article XXI(b)(iii) by the US. Concerning the Panel decision on this issue, see page 601 and the discussion of Article XXIII below. When the Council discussed the Panel Report, Nicaragua requested that the Council recommend removal of the embargo; authorize special support measures for Nicaragua so that countries wanting to do so could grant trade preferences aimed at re-establishing a balance in Nicaragua’s pre-embargo global trade relations and at compensating Nicaragua for the damage caused by the embargo; and prepare an interpretative note on Article XXI. Consensus was not reached on any of these alternatives. The Panel Report has not been adopted. At the meeting of the Council on 3 April 1990 Nicaragua announced the lifting of the trade embargo. The representative of the US announced that the conditions which had necessitated action under Article XXI had ceased to exist, his country's national security emergency with respect to Nicaragua had been terminated, and all economic sanctions, including the trade embargo, had been lifted.³³

In November 1991, the European Community notified the contracting parties that the EC and its member States had decided to adopt trade measures against Yugoslavia "on the grounds that the situation prevailing in Yugoslavia no longer permits the preferential treatment of this country to be upheld. Therefore, as from 11 November, imports from Yugoslavia into the Community are applied m.f.n. treatment ... These measures are taken by the European Community upon consideration of its essential security interests and based on GATT Article XXI."³⁴ The measures comprised suspension of trade concessions granted to the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia under its bilateral trade agreement with the EC; application of certain limitations (previously suspended) to textile imports from Yugoslavia; withdrawal of GSP benefits; suspension of similar concessions and GSP benefits for ECSC products; and action to denounce or suspend the application of the bilateral trade agreements between the EC and its member states and Yugoslavia. On 2 December the Community and its member states decided to apply selective measures in favour of "those parties which contribute to progress toward peace". Economic sanctions or withdrawal of preferential benefits from the Yugoslavia were also taken by Australia, Austria, Canada, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, and the United States.

At the Forty-seventh Session in December 1991, Yugoslavia referred to the Decision of 1982 on notification of measures taken under Article XXI (see page 605 below) and reserved its GATT rights. In February 1992 Yugoslavia requested establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2, stating that the measures taken by the EC were inconsistent with Articles I, XXI and the Enabling Clause; departed from the letter and intention of paragraph 7(iii) of the Ministerial Decision of November 1982; and impeded the attainment of the objectives of the General Agreement. Yugoslavia further stated:

"The situation in Yugoslavia is a specific one and does not correspond to the notion and meaning of Article XXI(b) and (c). There is no decision or resolution of the relevant UN body to impose economic sanctions against Yugoslavia based on the reasoning embodied in the UN Charter....the 'positive compensatory measures' applied by the European Community to certain parts of Yugoslavia [are] contrary to the MFN treatment of 'products originating in or destined for the territories' - taken as a whole - 'of all contracting parties'".³⁵

In March 1992, the Council agreed to establish a panel with the standard terms of reference unless, as provided in the Decision of 12 April 1989, the parties agreed otherwise within twenty days.³⁶ At the April 1992 Council meeting, in discussion of the notification of the transformation of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY) into the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) consisting of the Republics of Serbia and Montenegro, the EC representative said that until the question of succession to Yugoslavia's contracting party status had been resolved, the Panel process which had been initiated between the former SFRY and the EC no longer had any foundation and could not proceed.³⁷ At the May 1992 Council meeting, in a discussion concerning the status of the FRY as a successor to the former SFRY as a contracting party, the Chairman stated that "In these circumstances, without prejudice to the question of who should succeed the former SFRY in the GATT, and until the Council returned to this issue, he proposed that the representative of the FRY should refrain from participating in the business of the Council". The Council so agreed.³⁸ At the June 1993 Council meeting this decision was modified taking into account United Nations General Assembly Resolution

4. Paragraph (c): “any action in pursuance of its obligations under the United Nations Charter for the maintenance of international peace and security”

India’s 1994 background document for simplified balance-of-payments consultations notes that while almost all of India’s trading partners received most-favoured-nation treatment in the issue of import licences, import licences were not issued for imports from countries facing UN mandated sanctions, at present Iraq, Fiji, Serbia and Montenegro”.⁴⁰ Brazil’s 1994 notification on import licensing notes that the import licensing system of Brazil applies for goods entering from or exported to any country except for those covered by UN embargoes.⁴¹ The import licensing notification of Cyprus similarly notes that imports from certain countries are prohibited in accordance with United Nations resolutions.⁴² The 1993 licensing notification of Norway notes that all imports from Iraq and Serbia/Montenegro are prohibited.⁴³

5. Other invocations of Article XXI

The United States embargo on trade with Cuba, which was imposed by means of Proclamation 3447 by the President of the United States, dated 3 February 1962, was not formally raised in the CONTRACTING PARTIES but notified by Cuba in the inventory of non-tariff measures. The United States invoked Article XXI as justification for its action.⁴⁴

6. Procedures concerning notification of measures under Article XXI

During the Council discussion in 1982 of trade measures for non-economic reasons taken against Argentina (see page 603), it was stated by the countries taking these measures that “Article XXI did not mention notification” and that many contracting parties had, in the past, invoked Article XXI without there having been any notification or challenge to the situation in GATT.⁴⁵ Argentina sought an interpretation of Article XXI. Informal consultations took place during the Thirty-eighth Session in November 1982 in connection with the adoption of the Council report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in so far as it related to these trade restrictions.⁴⁶ As a result, on 30 November 1982 the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted the following “Decision Concerning Article XXI of the General Agreement”:

“Considering that the exceptions envisaged in Article XXI of the General Agreement constitute an important element for safeguarding the rights of contracting parties when they consider that reasons of security are involved;

“Noting that recourse to Article XXI could constitute, in certain circumstances, an element of disruption and uncertainty for international trade and affect benefits accruing to contracting parties under the General Agreement;

“Recognizing that in taking action in terms of the exceptions provided in Article XXI of the General Agreement, contracting parties should take into consideration the interests of third parties which may be affected;

The CONTRACTING PARTIES decide that:

“1. Subject to the exception in Article XXI:a, contracting parties should be informed to the fullest extent possible of trade measures taken under Article XXI.

“3. The Council may be requested to give further consideration to this matter in due course”.⁴⁷

See the references to this Decision above in the case of EC measures on trade with Yugoslavia.

B. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE XXI AND OTHER ARTICLES OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT

1. Articles I and XIII

During the discussion at the Third Session of the complaint of Czechoslovakia that US export controls were administered inconsistently with Articles I and XIII (see page 602), the US representative stated that these restrictions were justified under Article XXI(b)(ii). In calling for a decision, the Chairman indicated that Article XXI “embodied exceptions to the general rule contained in Article I”. In a Decision of 8 June 1949 under Article XXIII:2, the CONTRACTING PARTIES rejected the contention of the Czechoslovak delegation.⁴⁸

2. Article XXIII

During discussions in Geneva in 1947 in connection with the removal of the provisions now contained in Article XXI and their relocation in a separate exception (Article 94) at the end of the Charter, the question was raised whether the dispute settlement provisions of Article 35 of the New York Draft [XXII/XXIII] would nevertheless apply. It was stated that “It is true that an action taken by a Member under Article 94 could not be challenged in the sense that it could not be claimed that a Member was violating the Charter; but if that action, even though not in conflict with the terms of Article 94, should affect another Member, I should think that that Member would have the right to seek redress of some kind under Article 35 as it now stands. In other words, there is no exception from the application of Article 35 to this or any other Article”.⁴⁹ The addition of a note to clarify that the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article 35 [XXIII] applied to Article 94 was rejected as unnecessary.⁵⁰

See the discussion above of the Czechoslovak complaint concerning export controls, in which the CONTRACTING PARTIES made a decision under Article XXIII:2 as to “whether the Government of the United States had failed to carry out its obligations under the Agreement through its administration of the issue of export licences”.⁵¹

During the discussion of the trade restrictions affecting Argentina applied for non-economic reasons, the view was expressed “that the provisions of Article XXI were subject to those of Article XXIII:2”. Argentina reserved its rights under Article XXIII in respect of any injury resulting from trade restrictions applied in the context of Article XXI.⁵²

Paragraph 2 of the “Decision Concerning Article XXI of the General Agreement” of 30 November 1982 stipulates that “... when action is taken under Article XXI, all contracting parties affected by such action retain their full rights under the General Agreement”.⁵³

The 1984 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Sugar from Nicaragua” examined the action taken by the US government to reduce the share of the US sugar import quota allocated to Nicaragua and distribute the reduction in Nicaragua’s allocation to El Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica. The Panel Report notes that “The United States stated that it was neither invoking any exceptions under the provisions of the General Agreement nor intending to defend its actions in GATT terms ... the action of the United States did of course affect trade, but was not taken for trade policy reasons”.⁵⁴

“The Panel noted that the measures taken by the United States concerning sugar imports from Nicaragua were but one aspect of a more general problem. The Panel, in accordance with its terms of reference ... examined those measures solely in the light of the relevant GATT provisions, concerning itself only with the trade issue under dispute.”⁵⁵

“... The Panel ... concluded that the sugar quota allocated to Nicaragua for the fiscal year 1983/84 was inconsistent with the United States’ obligations under Article XIII:2.

“The Panel noted that the United States had not invoked any of the exceptions provided for in the General Agreement permitting discriminatory quantitative restrictions contrary to Article XIII. The Panel therefore did not examine whether the reduction in Nicaragua’s quota could be justified under any such provision.”⁵⁶

The follow-up on the Panel report was discussed in the Council meetings of May and July 1984. The United States said that it “had not obstructed Nicaragua’s resort to GATT’s dispute settlement process; it had stated explicitly the conditions under which the issue might be resolved; and it recognized that Nicaragua had certain rights under Article XXIII which it had reserved and could continue to exercise”.⁵⁷ Nicaragua stated that it was aware of its rights under Article XXIII.

In July 1985, following a request by Nicaragua for the establishment of a panel to review certain US trade measures affecting Nicaragua, the right of a contracting party to invoke Article XXIII in cases involving Article XXI was discussed again in the GATT Council.⁵⁸ At its meetings in October 1985 and March 1986 respectively the Council established a panel with the following terms of reference to deal with the complaint by Nicaragua:

“To examine, in the light of the relevant GATT provisions, of the understanding reached at the Council on 10 October 1985 that the Panel cannot examine or judge the validity of or motivation for the invocation of Article XXI(b)(iii) by the United States, of the relevant provisions of the Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance (BISD 26S/211-218), and of the agreed Dispute Settlement Procedures contained in the 1982 Ministerial Declaration (BISD 29S/13-16), the measures taken by the United States on 7 May 1985 and their trade effects in order to establish to what extent benefits accruing to Nicaragua under the General Agreement have been nullified or impaired, and to make such findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in further action in this matter”.⁵⁹

In the Panel Report on “United States - Trade Measures affecting Nicaragua”, which has not been adopted, the Panel noted the different views of the parties regarding whether the United States’ invocation of Article XXI(b)(iii) was proper, and concluded that this issue was not within its terms of reference; see above at page 601. With regard to Nicaragua’s claim of non-violation nullification or impairment, the Panel “decided not to propose a ruling in this case on the basic question of whether actions under Article XXI could nullify or impair GATT benefits of the adversely affected contracting party”.⁶⁰

When the Panel’s report was discussed by the Council in November 1986, the US representative stated that “Nullification or impairment when no GATT violation had been found was a delicate issue, linked to the concept of ‘reasonable expectations’. It was not simply a question of trade damage, since no one doubted the existence of trade damage. Applying the concept of ‘reasonable expectations’ to a case of trade sanctions motivated by national security considerations would be particularly perilous, since at a broader level those security considerations would nevertheless enter into expectations ... the Panel had acted wisely in refraining from a decision that could create a precedent of much wider ramifications for the scope of GATT rights and obligations ...”.⁶¹ The representative of Nicaragua stated that her delegation could not support adoption of the report, inter alia because it could only be adopted once the Council was in a position to make recommendations.⁶²

C. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE XXI AND GENERAL INTERNATIONAL LAW

The 1986 Panel Report on “United States - Trade Measures Affecting Nicaragua”, which has not been adopted, notes the different views of the parties to the dispute concerning the relationship between Article XXI and general international law including decisions of the United Nations and the International Court of Justice.⁶³

In discussion at the Forty-seventh Session in December 1991 concerning trade measures for non-economic purposes against Yugoslavia, the representative of India stated that “India did not favour the use of trade measures for non-economic reasons. Such measures should only be taken within the framework of a decision by the United Nations Security Council. In the absence of such a decision or resolution, there was a serious risk that such measures might be unilateral or arbitrary and would undermine the multilateral trading system”.⁶⁴

III. PREPARATORY WORK

In the US Draft Charter, and London and New York Draft Charter texts, the Article on exceptions to the commercial policy chapter included the provisions of what is now GATT Article XXI (see Article 32, US draft; Article 37, London and New York drafts). Also in these drafts, the exceptions clause for the chapter on commodity agreements included provisions excepting arrangements relating to fissionable materials; to the traffic in arms, ammunition and implements of war and traffic in goods and materials for the purpose of supplying a military establishment; or in time of war or other emergency in international relations, to the protection of the essential security interests of a member (Article 49:2, US Draft; Article 59(2), London Draft; Article 59(c), New York Draft). At Geneva it was decided to take paragraphs (c), (d), (e) and (k) of Article 37 and place them in a separate Article.⁶⁵ It was agreed that this Article would be a general exception applicable to the entire Charter.⁶⁶ The corresponding security exception was also removed from the commodity chapter. The security exception provisions became Article 94 in Chapter VII of the Geneva draft Charter, which was virtually identical to the present text of Article XXI.

The text of Article 94 was extensively discussed at Havana in the Sixth Committee on Organization. Article 94 became Article 99 of the Charter on General Exceptions, of which paragraphs 1(a) and (b) were almost identical to those of Article XXI, the only differences being (i) an addition in the first line of paragraph (b) as follows: “to prevent any Member from taking, either singly or with other States, any action ...”, and (ii) an addition to paragraph (b)(ii) as follows: “a military establishment of any other country”. Article 99 also included a paragraph 1(c) exempting intergovernmental military supply agreements⁶⁷; a paragraph 1(d) on trade relations between India and Pakistan (dealt with in the General Agreement by the provisions of Article XXIV:11); and a paragraph 2 providing that nothing in the Charter would override the provisions of peace treaties resulting from the Second World War or UN instruments creating trust territories or other special regimes.

However, “on examining several of the proposals submitted by delegations relating to action taken in connection with political matters or with the essential interests of Members, the Committee concluded that the provisions regarding such action should be made in connection with an article on ‘Relations with the United Nations’, since the question of the proper allocation of responsibility as between the Organization and the United Nations was involved”.⁶⁸ Accordingly a new Article 86 of the Charter on “Relations with the United Nations” was drafted, including the former paragraph 1(c) of Article 94 [XXI:(c)].

Article 86 of the Charter dealt with various institutional questions such as the conclusion of a specialized agency agreement between the ITO and the UN. It also stated, in paragraphs 3 and 4, that:

“3. The Members recognize that the Organization should not attempt to take action which would involve passing judgement in any way on essentially political matters. Accordingly, and in order to avoid conflict of responsibility between the United Nations and the Organization with respect to such matters, any measure taken by a Member directly in connection with a political matter brought before the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of Chapters IV or VI of the United Nations Charter shall be deemed to fall within the scope of the United Nations, and shall not be subject to the provisions of this Charter.

“4. No action, taken by a Member in pursuance of its obligations under the United Nations Charter for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security, shall be deemed to conflict with the provisions of this Charter”.

The interpretative notes to paragraph 3 provided that:

“1. If any Member raises the question whether a measure is in fact taken directly in connection with a political matter brought before the United Nations in accordance with the provisions of Chapters IV or VI of the United Nations Charter, the responsibility for making a determination on the question shall rest with the Organization. If, however, political issues beyond the competence of the Organization are involved in making such a determination, the question shall be deemed to fall within the scope of the United Nations.

“2. If a Member which has no direct political concern in a matter brought before the United Nations considers that a measure taken directly in connection therewith and falling within the scope of paragraph 3 of Article 86 constitutes a nullification or impairment within the terms of paragraph 1 of Article 93, it shall seek redress only by recourse to the procedures set forth in Chapter VIII of this Charter”.

The purpose of these provisions was explained by the Sixth Committee as follows:

“Paragraph 3 of Article [86], which like paragraph 4 is independent in its operation, is designed to deal with any measure which is directly in connection with a political matter brought before the United Nations in a manner which will avoid conflict of responsibility between the United Nations and the Organization with respect to political matters. The Committee agreed that this provision would cover measures maintained by a Member even though another Member had brought the particular matter before the United Nations, so long as the measure was taken directly in connection with the matter. It was also agreed that such a measure, as well as the political matter with which it was directly connected, should remain within the jurisdiction of the United Nations and not within that of the Organization. The Committee was of the opinion that the important thing was to maintain the jurisdiction of the United Nations over political matters and over economic measures of this sort taken directly in connection with such a political matter, and nothing in Article [86] could be held to prejudice the freedom of action of the United Nations to settle such matters and to take steps to deal with such economic measures in accordance with the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations if they see fit to do so.

⁶⁸Havana Reports, p. 153, para. (a).

“It was the view of the Committee that the word ‘measure’ in paragraph 3 of Article [86] refers only to a measure which is taken directly in connection with a political matter brought before the United Nations in accordance with Chapters IV and VI of the Charter of the United Nations and does not refer to any other measure”.⁶⁹

The Charter provisions in Articles 86 and 99 were not taken into the General Agreement. While Article XXIX:1 provides that “The contracting parties undertake to observe ... the general principles of Chapters I to VI inclusive and of Chapter IX of the Havana Charter”, the Note Ad Article XXIX:1 provides that “Chapters VII and VIII ... have been excluded from paragraph 1 because they generally deal with the organization, functions and procedures of the International Trade Organization”. In this connection, during the discussion at the Sixth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES of the US suspension of trade relations with Czechoslovakia it was stated with reference to Article 86, paragraph 3 of the Havana Charter that “although Chapter VII of the Charter was not specifically included by reference in Article XXIX of the Agreement, it had surely been the general intention that the principles of the Charter should be guiding ones for the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.⁷⁰

The present text of Article XXI dates from the 30 October 1948 Geneva Final Act. It has never been amended. Amendment of Article XXI was neither proposed nor discussed in the 1954-55 Review Session.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXII

Article XXII

Consultation

1. Each contracting party shall accord sympathetic consideration to, and shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding, such representations as may be made by another contracting party with respect to any matter affecting the operation of this Agreement.

2. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may, at the request of a contracting party, consult with any contracting party or parties in respect of any matter for which it has not been possible to find a satisfactory solution through consultation under paragraph 1.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXIIA. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXII*1. General(1) Procedural provisions regarding consultations under Article XXII(a) 1958 "Procedures under Article XXII on Questions Affecting the Interests of a Number of Contracting Parties"

At the Thirteenth Session, by a Decision of 10 November 1958, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted the following "Procedures under Article XXII on Questions Affecting the Interests of a Number of Contracting Parties":¹

"1. Any contracting party seeking a consultation under Article XXII shall, at the same time, so inform the Executive Secretary for the information of all contracting parties.

"2. Any other contracting party asserting a substantial trade interest in the matter shall, within forty-five days of the notification by the Executive Secretary of the request for consultation, advise the consulting countries and the Executive Secretary of its desire to be joined in the consultation.

"3. Such contracting party shall be joined in the consultation provided that the contracting party or parties to which the request for consultation is addressed agree that the claim of substantial interest is well founded; in that event they shall so inform the contracting parties concerned and the Executive Secretary.

"4. If the claim to be joined in the consultation is not accepted, the applicant contracting party shall be free to refer its claim to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

"5. At the close of the consultation, the consulting countries shall advise the Executive Secretary for the information of all contracting parties of the outcome.

"6. The Executive Secretary shall provide such assistance in these consultations as the parties may request".

These procedures originated in discussions in the Intersessional Committee in April and May 1958 concerning the provisions of the Treaty of Rome on the Association of the Overseas Territories to the European Common Market. In these discussions, "Some members ... proposed ... that some procedures be set up which provided for multilateral consultations between the Six and producing countries which considered that their trade would be affected with a view to discussing the value and extent of any measures that could be taken to alleviate any resulting damage to their trade; each commodity could be dealt with separately and some co-ordinating machinery should be established to supervise the discussions. Most members ... considered that traditional GATT principles and methods of procedure, in particular the provisions for consultations under Article XXII, were flexible enough to deal effectively with the problem".² In response, the representative of the Community stated, inter alia:

"... Article XXII of the General Agreement provides a bilateral procedure as a first stage and a multilateral procedure as a second stage. Full use has not yet been made of these procedures. In certain cases where injury had been caused, Article XXII has been resorted to in order to remedy such injury, but there is nothing in the wording of this Article which prevents us from invoking and applying it where serious injury is threatened. Why not then turn to Article XXII in order to find a solution to these consultation problems which are before us?"³

²IC/SR.38, p. 19.
³*Ibid.*, p. 29.

The Report of the Intersessional Committee in 1958 on “The Treaty Establishing the European Economic Community” records the following:

“At the Twelfth Session the CONTRACTING PARTIES instructed the Intersessional Committee to continue the examination, in the light of the provisions of the General Agreement, of the relevant provisions of the Treaty of Rome, the problems likely to arise in its practical application, and the means that might be developed to establish effective and continuing co-operation between the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the European Economic Community (EEC).

“In the light of ... statements and reports [on the Treaty] the Committee felt that it would be more fruitful if attention could be directed to specific and practical problems, leaving aside for the time being questions of law ... The Committee noted that the normal procedure of the General Agreement and the techniques and traditions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in applying them, were well adapted to the handling of such problems and suggested that in the first instance the procedures of Article XXII would be the most appropriate for this purpose.

“Accordingly, the Committee agreed upon procedures for dealing with specific and practical problems by means of consultations between members of the Community and other contracting parties. These procedures were later approved by the Council and the Commission of the EEC”.⁴

These procedures for consultations under Article XXII were thus initially agreed in April and May 1958.⁵ After the first requests for consultations under these procedures had been received, further discussions took place in the Intersessional Committee. “It was suggested that the procedures could be improved if a time-limit were fixed for requests to be joined in a consultation, and it was understood that approval for a request to be joined in a consultation was required only from the contracting party to whom the request was addressed. ... The question was raised in the Committee as to whether the procedures were intended to permit only contracting parties with an exporting or a producing interest to participate in the consultations, or whether contracting parties with an importing interest might also be joined. The Committee did not enter into a discussion of principle on this point, it being understood that ... if a case arose in any particular consultation where a claim of substantial interest was disputed the matter could be referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.”⁶

A revised text of the Procedures was then adopted at the Thirteenth Session, as indicated above. In his summing-up of the discussion on this item at the Session, the Chairman indicated that “The principal purpose of these procedures was to provide the framework within which a consultation initiated by a contracting party could be broadened, so as to include other contracting parties having a ‘substantial trade interest’ in the matter under discussion and which wished to be joined in the consultation. ... It was intended that such multilateral consultations on questions affecting the interests of a number of contracting parties would facilitate the observance of the basic principles and objectives of the General Agreement. Thus, the procedures proposed by the Committee were not intended to relate only to consultations between contracting parties and Members of the European Economic Community, but for any consultations under Article XXII on matters affecting the interests of more than one contracting party”.⁷

In a few instances Article XXII consultations have been held at the suggestion of the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES; see the table at the end of this chapter.⁸

(b) 1979 “Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance”

The “Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance”, adopted 28 November 1979, provides with regard to consultations:

“Contracting parties reaffirm their resolve to strengthen and improve the effectiveness of consultative procedures employed by contracting parties. In that connexion, they undertake to respond to requests for consultations promptly and to attempt to conclude consultations expeditiously, with a view to reaching mutually satisfactory conclusions. Any requests for consultations should include the reasons therefor.

“During consultations, contracting parties should give special attention to the particular problems and interests of less-developed contracting parties”.⁹

(c) 1989 Decision on “Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures”

The Decision on “Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures”, adopted in April 1989, provides with regard to Article XXII consultations:

“If a request is made under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1, the contracting party to which the request is made shall, unless otherwise mutually agreed, reply to the request within ten days after its receipt and shall enter into consultations in good faith within a period of no more than thirty days from the date of the request, with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory solution. If the contracting party does not respond within ten days, or does not enter into consultations within a period of no more than thirty days, or a period otherwise mutually agreed, from the date of the request, then the contracting party that requested the holding of consultations may proceed directly to request the establishment of a panel or a working party.”

“In cases of urgency, including those which concern perishable goods en route, parties shall enter into consultations within a period of no more than ten days from the date of the request. If the consultations have failed to settle the dispute within a period of thirty days after the request, the complaining party may request the establishment of a panel or a working party”.¹⁰

This Decision provides generally that “Contracting parties agree that the existing rules and procedures of the GATT in the field of dispute settlement shall continue. It is further agreed that the improvements set out below, which aim to ensure prompt and effective resolution of disputes to the benefit of all contracting parties, shall be applied on a trial basis from 1 May 1989 to the end of the Uruguay Round in respect of complaints brought during that period under Article XXII and XXIII ...”.¹¹ On 22 February 1994 the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided to keep the 1989 Decision in effect until the entry into force of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (“DSU”), contained in Annex 2 of the WTO Agreement.¹² On 1 January 1995 the WTO Agreement entered into force and with it the DSU. The 1989 Decision accordingly lapsed. See the provisions in the DSU on consultations.

(d) Consultations on residual import restrictions

In 1960 the CONTRACTING PARTIES approved “Procedures for dealing with new import restrictions applied for balance-of-payments reasons and residual import restrictions”. The procedures for residual import restrictions provide for notification of such import restrictions. Paragraph 8 of the Decision provides that bilateral consultations under Article XXII:1 may be sought by the contracting party applying the restrictions or by contracting parties affected by them, and that the Secretariat should be informed of requests “so that in cases where the restrictions in question affect the interests of a number of contracting parties, the procedures adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 10 November 1958 should apply”.¹³ A number of instances of such consultations appear in the table at the end of this chapter.

(2) Scope of consultations under Article XXII

During the discussion at the Thirteenth Session of the Procedures above, the representative of France, speaking for the EEC, stated that

“The Six had agreed to submit to the normal consultation procedures as provided in Article XXII and had already initiated consultations. This procedure left aside the theoretical issues and envisaged, within the framework of Article XXII, a number of concrete cases. Under the consultation procedure an opportunity was afforded to examine step-by-step, as and when measures were taken by the Community, the extent to which these measures might create damage for other contracting parties, either actual or in the near future and predictable in a precise way. The Six were prepared to consult on problems arising from the implementation of the Treaty but not on the Community’s supposed or real intentions”.¹⁴

In summing up the discussion,

“The Chairman ... referred to the point made by many delegations that the implementation of the consultation procedures under Article XXII should not necessarily be postponed until there had been actual damage, or even until action which might result in damage had been taken. The representative of France, as spokesman of the six Member States, had pointed out that consultations should not be initiated on purely hypothetical grounds and that whatever procedures were adopted they should be generally applicable to all contracting parties and not specifically confined to the six Member States. In this connexion, the Chairman referred to the provisions of both Article XXII and the procedures the CONTRACTING PARTIES had just adopted for the implementation thereof. No reference was made in either case to ‘damage’ as such, and the text of Article XXII merely provided that sympathetic consideration and adequate opportunity for consultations be accorded to such ‘representations’ as might be made by any contracting party with respect to any matter affecting the operation of the General Agreement. The concept of a ‘representation’ did neither prejudice the basis for a consultation nor convey the implication that any damage must necessarily be established. The representative of France, as spokesman for the six Member States, had rightly observed that, for consultations under the procedure just approved to be fruitful, problems of a practical and concrete nature and not just vague apprehensions should be discussed. This did not preclude any contracting party wishing to put forward views on the effects on its trade of any possible action, making representations in order that the six Member States in formulating their commercial policy could have due regard to what might be the subject of future consultations. The view had been expressed that contracting parties should be kept informed of developments in the commercial policy of the Community as it was formulated. This desire seemed legitimate if effective use were to be made of the procedures for the implementation of the provisions of Article XXII”.¹⁵

At a later meeting in the Thirteenth Session, in connection with the adoption of conclusions on the Treaty of Rome, the representative of Cuba asked for a clarification of the following question: “... Article XXII established the obligation to give sympathetic consideration to any representations. This commitment had been undertaken by all contracting parties without reservation. Contracting parties had a right to ask and the corresponding obligation to accept consultations on trade matters even without the need for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to take a special decision to that effect. Was this interpretation mistaken and were the Six entitled to make their acceptance of consultations conditional upon the existence of concrete damage?”¹⁶ The Chairman’s summing up noted in response:

“Many delegations had addressed themselves to the status of damage as an element featuring in the consultations. In this connexion the Chairman referred to the broad lines of his summing up on this point at the previous debate (SR.13/15) to which [the representative of the Six] had expressed his concurrence. The reason why there had been no attempt to spell out the broad interpretation with any more precision was that no matter what wording was used in such an interpretation it would present exactly the same problems that had been encountered in the past.

“Turning to the request of the representative of Cuba for an authoritative interpretation of Article XXII the Chairman pointed out that this Article was one to which the authors of the General Agreement did not deem it necessary to add an interpretative note. The Chairman submitted that the reason for this was that in the wording ‘sympathetic consideration’ in that Article the element of ‘sympathy’ could not be subjected to legal definition; the whole concept of representations pursuant to Article XXII:1 was not a legalistic one but one which had to be charged with an element of ‘sympathy’. ... No Article of the General Agreement, however, and much less one which enjoined ‘sympathetic consideration’ and prescribed consultations, could ensure that the participating parties would reach agreement on a particular difficulty. ...”¹⁷

In discussions at the Fourteenth Session reviewing the consultations that had taken place, the EEC representative stated that “the Six could hardly recognize in advance consequences which would be contrary to their own belief that the Rome Treaty would bring about a general expansion of trade with third countries, unless evidence of concrete damage could be furnished ... The Community holds the view that the consultations which have already been initiated have made it possible to appraise more accurately and more fully the problems which have been raised. The Community, for its part, would be prepared to resume consultations on those products which have already been considered and, still with the desire to reach better mutual consultations, to accept the opening of consultations on additional products”.¹⁸

By a communication dated 3 February 1993 to the representatives of Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela, the representative of the Commission of the EC declined a request from these contracting parties to hold formal consultations under Article XXII:1 on the future EC import regime for bananas, stating that “the meeting of the Council of the European Communities on 17 December 1992 did not in fact result in a formal decision on this regime; the result of the debate was limited to a political orientation about some of the features of the future common market organization for bananas which still need to be formalized in the internal decision-making process of the Community institutions. The present preparatory works cannot therefore be considered as a measure under Articles XXII:1 or XXIII:1 of the General Agreement allowing for formal consultations under one of these provisions.”¹⁹ See also the discussions in the GATT Council during 1992-93 on Article XXII:1 and the proposed EC import regime for bananas.²⁰

A table of consultations under Article XXII:1 subsequent to adoption of the 1958 Procedures appears at the end of this chapter.

(1) Notifications regarding consultations under Article XXII:1

The 1958 Procedures provide in paragraph 1 that “Any contracting party seeking a consultation under Article XXII shall, at the same time, so inform the Executive Secretary for the information of all contracting parties”. See also the reference to notification in the 1960 Procedures referred to directly above.

The 1989 Decision on “Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures” provides:

“Requests for consultations under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1 shall be notified to the Council by the party which requests consultations. Any request for consultations shall be submitted in writing and shall give the reasons for the request.”

“Mutually agreed solutions to matters formally raised under GATT Articles XXII and XXIII ... must be notified to the Council where any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto”.²¹

Since entry into effect of the 1989 Decision, requests for consultations have been circulated by the Secretariat in the DS/ document series; since entry into force of the WTO Agreement (and thereby the DSU), such requests have been circulated to Members and observers in the WTO, in the WT/DS series.

(2) Relationship between consultations under Article XXII:1 and consultations under Article XXII:2 or dispute settlement proceedings under Article XXIII:2

The 1960 Procedures for consultation on residual import restrictions provide in paragraph 9 that “If consultations held under paragraph 1 of Article XXII do not lead to a satisfactory solution, any of the parties to the consultations may request that consultations be carried out by the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 2 of Article XXII. Alternatively, a country whose interests are affected may resort to paragraph 2 of Article XXIII, it being understood that a consultation held under paragraph 1 of Article XXII would be considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as fulfilling the conditions of paragraph 1 of Article XXIII”.²²

However, the practice of proceeding from consultations under Article XXII:1 to the establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2 predated the 1960 Decision. For instance, the Panel on “French Assistance to Exports of Wheat and Wheat Flour” was established by the Intersessional Committee at its April-May 1958 meeting after consultations under Article XXII:1 between the two parties to the dispute, Australia and France.²³

The 1989 Decision on “Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures” provides with regard to Article XXII consultations:

“If the consultations under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1 fail to settle a dispute within sixty days after the request for consultations, the complaining party may request the establishment of a panel or a working party under Article XXIII:2. The complaining party may request a panel or a working party during the sixty-day period if the parties jointly consider that consultations have failed to settle the dispute”.²⁴

In Council discussion of the recourse to Article XXIII:2 by the EEC concerning “Japan Customs duties, taxes and labelling practices on imported wines and alcoholic beverages”²⁵ the representative of Japan stated that consultations under Article XXII:1 had not been exhausted and it was premature to proceed to Article XXIII:2. Noting that in the dispute concerning “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act”²⁶ the parties had moved directly from Article XXII:1 to Article XXIII:2, he stated that in that case both the United States and Canada had agreed that the requirement in Article XXIII:1 had been fulfilled whereas, in the case at hand, Japan did not agree that the requirement had been met.²⁷ The Legal Adviser to the Director-General “said that in his view it was not necessary that both parties so agree before moving to set up a panel under Article XXIII:2; such a condition would mean that one party could indefinitely block the procedures simply by saying that bilateral consultations had not yet been terminated”.²⁸

(1) Consultations concerning commodity problems

See section III below concerning the source of Article XXII:2, in the proposal of Pakistan during the Review Session for a provision for consultations on decline in the off-take of primary commodities exported by developing countries. Resort to the provisions of Article XXII:2 was referred to in connection with discussions on commodity trade which continued after the Review Session. The Resolution on “Particular Difficulties Connected with Trade in Primary Commodities” adopted in the Eleventh Session in 1956 provided, inter alia, that the CONTRACTING PARTIES “Resolve ... that it would be appropriate for them to enter into consultations on problems arising out of the trade in primary commodities pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article XXII and of paragraph 5 of Article XVIII ...”.²⁹ The Report of the Working Party on “Particular Difficulties Connected with Trade in Primary Commodities”, which drafted that Resolution, notes the ruling made at the Tenth Session that the CONTRACTING PARTIES have the competence to deal, at the request of one or more contracting parties, with difficulties arising in connexion with international trade in primary commodities.³⁰ The Report provides that

“... In addition to this broad competence which would make it possible for any contracting party to submit to the CONTRACTING PARTIES any particular difficulties which it was experiencing in connexion with trade in primary commodities, and which difficulties were in its view such as to impede the attainment of the objectives of the General Agreement, there are specific provisions in the General Agreement which afford an opportunity for contracting parties to secure consideration of special problems arising in this field ... difficulties of this kind would be appropriate matters to bring forward under Article XXII, which, when the revised text comes into effect, will provide not only for bilateral consultations, but also for consultations with the CONTRACTING PARTIES as a whole ...”.³¹

The Report of the Working Party in the Thirteenth Session on “Particular Difficulties Connected with Trade in Primary Commodities” examined actions taken to follow up on the 1956 Resolution, and noted that:

“Paragraph 3 of the basic resolution has not been utilized, perhaps due to a lack of understanding of the potentialities of the General Agreement in facilitating consultations on trade problems of concern to individual contracting parties or the CONTRACTING PARTIES generally. Therefore the Working Party has thought it useful to describe the manner in which contracting parties may have recourse to the facilities of Articles XXII and XXV for dealing with problems in their trade in primary products. Article XXII provides for consultations between contracting parties on any matter affecting the operation of the Agreement. At this session the CONTRACTING PARTIES have adopted procedures whereby these can be broadened into multilateral consultations and it should be noted that there is nothing in this Article which would prevent the participating governments from inviting non-contracting parties to take part. However, there may be situations in which joint action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXV would be more appropriate, for example, where a developing situation might lead to commercial policy measures being taken by one or more contracting parties which would be injurious to others unless it is dealt with by co-operative action ... Thus under these two Articles there are procedures, for initiating action and a search for solutions, which are well adapted for dealing with many of the special situations arising in the trade in primary products which could be more appropriately handled by GATT techniques than otherwise.”³²

“Accordingly, the Working Party recommends that contracting parties, when contemplating action on problems arising in commodity trade, should consider the possibility of initiating consultations under Article XXII with a view to arriving at mutually acceptable solutions, thus avoiding the need for unilateral action. ...”.³³

³³*Ibid.*, 7S/45, para. 8.

The Report of the Working Party in the Fourteenth Session on “Impact of Commodity Problems on International Trade” further noted: “... The General Agreement offers facilities for bilateral and multilateral consultations of which governments may avail themselves when difficulties arise in international commodity trade. ... Contracting parties, whether importing or exporting countries, can avail themselves of the provisions of Article XXII of the General Agreement and initiate consultations under that Article when difficulties arise in connexion with their commodity trade”.³⁴

A Working Party on Dairy Products was established in December 1967 “to conduct, on behalf of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, consultations under Article XXII:2 on urgent problems in international trade in dairy products with a view to arriving at mutually acceptable solutions and to report to the Council”.³⁵ The Working Party resulted in the drawing up of the Arrangement Concerning Certain Dairy Products.³⁶ A Working Party was also established in February 1968 on poultry³⁷ but did not conclude its work.

In 1986, the EEC requested the establishment of a Working Party under Article XXII:2 concerning Japanese measures affecting the world market for copper ores and concentrates.³⁸ The EC representative stated, inter alia, that the Community had invoked Article XXII:1 in 1982, and when that approach proved fruitless, Article XXII:2 in 1984. The Community’s request for a working party was based on the Eleventh Session (1956) Resolution on commodity trade referred to above in this section. The Council established a Group of Governmental Experts on this subject without reference to Article XXII:2.³⁹ See also the material on this matter under Article XXIII.

(2) Other consultations held under Article XXII:2

The table at the top of the next page lists other consultations held under Article XXII:2 following consultations held on the same matter under Article XXII:1 or other bilateral consultations.

B. CONSULTATIONS UNDER OTHER PROVISIONS

1. Consultations under other Articles of the General Agreement

Many other GATT provisions require contracting parties to consult in specific instances, e.g.:

Articles II:5; VI:7; VII:1; VIII:2; IX:6; XII:4; XIII:4; XVI:4; XVIII:7, 12, 16, 21, 22; XIX:2; XXIII; XXIV:7; XXV:1; XXVII; XXVIII:1 and 4; XXXVII:2.

For instance, Working Parties have been established by the CONTRACTING PARTIES without reference to Article XXII or XXIII to examine “Suspension of customs liquidation by the United States”⁴⁰, the “French Trade Measures” of 1968⁴¹, various import deposit schemes⁴², import surcharges⁴³, or export subsidies.⁴⁴

2. Consultations under Decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES

(1) Consultations on border tax adjustments

The Report of the Working Party on "Border Tax Adjustments" in 1968 recommended that a consultation procedure be established "whereby, upon request by a contracting party, a multilateral consultation could take place on changes in tax adjustments, whether notified or not. Such consultations would be held within the scope of the relevant GATT provisions. Upon request, contracting parties should be prepared to justify the reasons for adjustment, the methods used, the amount of compensation and to furnish proof thereof".⁴⁵ In adopting that Report, the Council agreed to establish such a consultation procedure.⁴⁶

(2) Liquidation of strategic stocks

In the Resolution of 4 March 1955 on "Liquidation of Strategic Stocks" the CONTRACTING PARTIES recognized, inter alia, "That any disturbing effects of such liquidations and the risk of injury may be avoided or minimized by consultations between the substantially interested contracting parties" and recommended, inter alia:

"That a contracting party, intending to liquidate and giving notice in accordance with paragraph 1, should consult with any contracting party which considers itself substantially interested and requests such consultations, with a view to avoiding or minimizing substantial injury to the economic interests of that contracting party and undue disruption of the markets for the product concerned and should give full and sympathetic consideration to the views expressed by such other interested contracting parties".⁴⁷

In 1981, Peru requested consultations with the United States under Articles XXII:1, XVIII:5 and this Resolution in regard to the liquidation of strategic stocks of silver.⁴⁸

(3) Restrictive business practices

In a Decision on “Arrangements for Consultations on Restrictive Business Practices”⁴⁹ in international trade between contracting parties, the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend consultations on such practices on a bilateral or multilateral basis as appropriate. The Decision does not refer to Article XXII.

3. Consultations provided for in Protocols of Accession

The Report of the Working Party on the Accession of Poland notes that “The Working Party agreed that it would be desirable that a set of provisions be incorporated in the draft Protocol for the Accession of Poland, designed to safeguard the interests of the parties concerned without hampering the development of a multilateral trading system between the CONTRACTING PARTIES and Poland, corresponding to the provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII but adapted to meet the particular requirements in this case. Paragraph 7 of the draft Protocol was drafted for this purpose”.⁵⁰ Provisions for consultations are also contained in the accession Protocols for Romania⁵¹ and Hungary.⁵²

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

In the US Draft Charter, Article 30, the article on consultation in the commercial policy chapter, included both provisions on consultation and provisions on nullification or impairment. In the London and New York drafts of the Charter these provisions appeared as two separate paragraphs of Article 35, still in the commercial policy chapter. During discussions in Geneva, it was decided to move the provisions on nullification or impairment to Chapter VIII of the Charter, and to expand their scope to cover the entire Charter. The provisions on consultation in the area of commercial policy remained in Article 41.

The text of Article XXII in the original (30 October 1947) text of the General Agreement was identical (mutatis mutandis) to Article 41 of the Geneva draft Charter, and provided as follows:

“Each contracting party shall accord sympathetic consideration to, and shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding, such representations as may be made by another contracting party with respect to the operation of customs regulations and formalities, anti-dumping and countervailing duties, quantitative and exchange regulations, subsidies, state-trading operations, sanitary laws and regulations for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health, and generally all matters affecting the operation of this Agreement”.

The corresponding provision in the Havana Charter, Article 41, was essentially identical except for the addition of “internal price regulations” and “transit regulations and practices” to the list of enumerated subjects for consultation. The following note based on the New York Draft (Article 35, paragraph 1) was added to the Havana Charter:

“The provisions for consultation require Members, subject to the exceptions specifically set forth in this Charter, to supply to other Members, upon request, such information as will enable a full and fair Article appraisal of the matters which are the subject of such consultation, including the operation of sanitary laws and regulations for the protection of human, animal or plant life or health, and other matters affecting the application of Chapter IV”.

Prior to the Review Session it was suggested that the selection of certain provisions of the Agreement for special reference was unnecessary, and the Article could be simplified.⁵³ During the Review Session, Pakistan proposed that any developing country affected by a decline in imports by a particular country of primary commodities exported by it, or by measures likely to lead to such a decline, be able to ask for consultations, stating that “where a grave threat has arisen or is likely to arise to the economy of an under-developed country consequent upon measures taken by the government or quasi-government organizations of another contracting party the former may be able, at the discretion of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, to invoke the procedure of multilateral consultations”.⁵⁴ In response the present text of Article XXII:2 was proposed by a sub-group of Review Working Party IV.⁵⁵ The changes to Article XXII were effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement, and entered into force 7 October 1957.

V. CONSULTATIONS UNDER ARTICLE XXII

A. CONSULTATIONS NOTIFIED UNDER THE 1958 PROCEDURES OR REFERRED TO IN SESSION OR COUNCIL RECORDS

The following table lists consultations notified formally under the 1958 procedures, or referred to in Session or Council discussions. As in many cases consultations have been held without formal notification, this list is necessarily incomplete. The date referred to is (in order of preference) the date of the communication reproduced, or the date of issuance of the document first listed, or the date of the meeting at which a request for consultations was made; where a reference to a consultation only appears in minutes of a subsequent meeting, the date is the date of the consultation or as a last resort, the date of that meeting.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXIII AND DECISIONS INTERPRETING ARTICLE XXIIIA. ARTICLE XXIII*Article XXIIINullification or Impairment*

1. If any contracting party should consider that any benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly under this Agreement is being nullified or impaired or that the attainment of any objective of the Agreement is being impeded as the result of

- (a) the failure of another contracting party to carry out its obligations under this Agreement, or
- (b) the application by another contracting party of any measure, whether or not it conflicts with the provisions of this Agreement, or
- (c) the existence of any other situation, the contracting party may, with a view to the satisfactory adjustment of the matter, make written representations or proposals to the other contracting party or parties which it considers to be concerned. Any contracting party thus approached shall give sympathetic consideration to the representations or proposals made to it.

2. If no satisfactory adjustment is effected between the contracting parties concerned within a reasonable time, or if the difficulty is of the type described in paragraph 1 (c) of this Article, the matter may be referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall promptly investigate any matter so referred to them and shall make appropriate recommendations to the contracting parties which they consider to be concerned, or give a ruling on the matter, as appropriate. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may consult with contracting parties, with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations and with any appropriate inter-governmental organization in cases where they consider such consultation necessary. If the CONTRACTING PARTIES consider that the circumstances are serious enough to justify such action, they may authorize a contracting party or parties to suspend the application to any other contracting party or parties of such concessions or other obligations under this Agreement as they determine to be appropriate in the circumstances. If the application to any contracting party of any concession or other obligation is in fact suspended, that contracting party shall then be free, not later than sixty days after such action is taken, to give written notice to the Executive Secretary to the CONTRACTING PARTIES of its intention to withdraw from this Agreement and such withdrawal shall take effect upon the sixtieth day following the day on which such notice is received by him.

B. UNDERSTANDING ON NOTIFICATION, CONSULTATION, DISPUTE SETTLEMENT AND SURVEILLANCE OF 28 NOVEMBER 1979 (26S/210)

1. The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirm their adherence to the basic GATT mechanism for the management of disputes based on Articles XXII and XXIII.¹ With a view to improving and refining the GATT mechanism, the CONTRACTING PARTIES agree as follows:

Notification

2. Contracting parties reaffirm their commitment to existing obligations under the General Agreement regarding publication and notification.²

3. Contracting parties moreover undertake, to the maximum extent possible, to notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES of their adoption of trade measures affecting the operation of the General Agreement, it being understood that such notification would of itself be without prejudice to views on the consistency of measures with or their relevance to rights and obligations under the General Agreement. Contracting parties should endeavour to notify such measures in advance of implementation. In other cases, where prior notification has not been possible, such measures should be notified promptly ex post facto. Contracting parties which have reason to believe that such trade measures have been adopted by another contracting party may seek information on such measures bilaterally, from the contracting party concerned.

Consultations

4. Contracting parties reaffirm their resolve to strengthen and improve the effectiveness of consultative procedures employed by contracting parties. In that connexion, they undertake to respond to requests for consultations promptly and to attempt to conclude consultations expeditiously, with a view to reaching mutually satisfactory conclusions. Any requests for consultations should include the reasons therefor.
5. During consultations, contracting parties should give special attention to the particular problems and interests of less- developed contracting parties.
6. Contracting parties should attempt to obtain satisfactory adjustment of the matter in accordance with the provisions of Article XXIII:1 before resorting to Article XXIII:2.

Dispute settlement

7. The CONTRACTING PARTIES agree that the customary practice of the GATT in the field of dispute settlement, described in the Annex, should be continued in the future, with the improvements set out below. They recognize that the efficient functioning of the system depends on their will to abide by the present understanding. The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirm that the customary practice includes the procedures for the settlement of disputes between developed and less-developed countries adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1966 (BISD, fourteenth supplement, page 18) and that these remain available to less-developed contracting parties wishing to use them.
8. If a dispute is not resolved through consultations the contracting parties concerned may request an appropriate body or individual to use their good offices with a view to the conciliation of the outstanding differences between the parties. If the unresolved dispute is one in which a less-developed contracting party has brought a complaint against a developed contracting party, the less-developed contracting party may request the good offices of the Director-General who, in carrying out his tasks, may consult with the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the Chairman of the Council.
9. It is understood that requests for conciliation and the use of the dispute settlement procedures of Article XXIII:2 should not be intended or considered as contentious acts and that, if disputes arise, all contracting parties will engage in these procedures in good faith in an effort to resolve the disputes. It is also understood that complaints and counter-complaints in regard to distinct matters should not be linked.
10. It is agreed that if a contracting party invoking Article XXIII:2 requests the establishment of a panel to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES to deal with the matter, the CONTRACTING PARTIES would decide on its establishment in accordance with standing practice. It is also agreed that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would similarly decide to establish a working party if this were requested by a contracting party invoking the Article. It is further agreed that such requests would be granted only after the contracting party concerned had had an opportunity to study the complaint and respond to it before the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
11. When a panel is set up, the Director-General, after securing the agreement of the contracting parties concerned, should propose the composition of the panel, of three or five members depending on the case, to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for approval. The members of a panel would preferably be governmental. It is understood that citizens of countries whose governments³ are parties to the dispute would not be members of the panel concerned with that dispute. The panel should be constituted as promptly as possible and normally not later than thirty days from the decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
12. The parties to the dispute would respond within a short period of time, i.e., seven working days, to nominations of panel members by the Director-General and would not oppose nominations except for compelling reasons.
13. In order to facilitate the constitution of panels, the Director- General should maintain an informal indicative list of governmental and non-governmental persons qualified in the fields of trade relations, economic development, and other matters covered by the General Agreement, and who could be available for serving on panels. For this purpose, each contracting party would be invited to indicate at the beginning of every year to the Director-General the name of one or two persons who would be available for such work.⁴
14. Panel members would serve in their individual capacities and not as government representatives, nor as representatives of any organization. Governments would therefore not give them instructions nor seek to influence them as individuals with regard to matters before a panel. Panel members should be selected with a view to ensuring the independence of the members, a sufficiently diverse background and wide spectrum of experience.⁵
15. Any contracting party having a substantial interest in the matter before a panel, and having notified this to the Council, should have an opportunity to be heard by the panel. Each panel should have the right to seek information and technical advice from any individual or body which it deems appropriate. However, before a panel seeks such information or advice from any individual or body within the jurisdiction of a State it shall inform the government of that State. Any contracting party should respond promptly and fully to any request by a panel for such information as the panel considers necessary and appropriate. Confidential information which is provided should not be revealed without formal authorization from the contracting party providing the information.
16. The function of panels is to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in discharging their responsibilities under Article XXIII:2. Accordingly, a panel should make an objective assessment of the matter before it, including an objective assessment of the facts of the case and the applicability of and conformity with the General Agreement and, if so requested by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, make such other findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making the recommendations or in giving the rulings provided for in Article XXIII:2. In this connexion, panels should consult regularly with the parties to the dispute and give them adequate opportunity to develop a mutually satisfactory solution.
17. Where the parties have failed to develop a mutually satisfactory solution, the panel should submit its findings in a written form. The report of a panel should normally set out the rationale behind any findings and recommendations that it makes. Where a bilateral settlement of the matter has been found, the report of the panel may be confined to a brief description of the case and to reporting that a solution has been reached.

18. To encourage development of mutually satisfactory solutions between the parties and with a view to obtaining their comments, each panel should first submit the descriptive part of its report to the parties concerned, and should subsequently submit to the parties to the dispute its conclusions, or an outline thereof, a reasonable period of time before they are circulated to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

19. If a mutually satisfactory solution is developed by the parties to a dispute before a panel, any contracting party with an interest in the matter has a right to enquire about and be given appropriate information about that solution in so far as it relates to trade matters.

20. The time required by panels will vary with the particular case.⁶ However, panels should aim to deliver their findings without undue delay, taking into account the obligation of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to ensure prompt settlement. In cases of urgency the panel would be called upon to deliver its findings within a period normally of three months from the time the panel was established.

21. Reports of panels and working parties should be given prompt consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The CONTRACTING PARTIES should take appropriate action on reports of panels and working parties within a reasonable period of time. If the case is one brought by a less-developed contracting party, such action should be taken in a specially convened meeting, if necessary. In such cases, in considering what appropriate action might be taken the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall take into account not only the trade coverage of measures complained of, but also their impact on the economy of less-developed contracting parties concerned.

22. The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall keep under surveillance any matter on which they have made recommendations or given rulings. If the CONTRACTING PARTIES' recommendations are not implemented within a reasonable period of time, the contracting party bringing the case may ask the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make suitable efforts with a view to finding an appropriate solution.

23. If the matter is one which has been raised by a less-developed contracting party, the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall consider what further action they might take which would be appropriate to the circumstances.

Surveillance

24. The CONTRACTING PARTIES agree to conduct a regular and systematic review of developments in the trading system. Particular attention would be paid to developments which affect rights and obligations under the GATT, to matters affecting the interests of less-developed contracting parties, to trade measures notified in accordance with this understanding and to measures which have been subject to consultation, conciliation or dispute settlement procedures laid down in this understanding.

Technical assistance

25. The technical assistance service of the GATT secretariat shall, at the request of a less-developed contracting party, assist it in connexion with matters dealt with in this understanding.

Notes:

¹It is noted that Article XXV may, as recognized by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, inter alia, when they adopted the report of the Working Party on particular difficulties connected with trade in primary products (L/930), also afford an appropriate avenue for consultation and dispute settlement in certain circumstances.

²See Secretariat Note, Notifications required from contracting parties (MTN/FR/W/17, dated 1 August 1978).

³In the case customs unions or common markets are parties to a dispute, this provision applies to citizens of all member countries of the customs unions or common markets.

⁴The coverage of travel expenses should be considered within the limits of budgetary possibilities.

⁵A statement is included in the Annex describing the current practice with respect to inclusion on panels of persons from developing countries.

⁶An explanation is included in the Annex that "in most cases the proceedings of the panels have been completed with a reasonable period of time, extending from three to nine months".

ANNEX

Agreed Description of the Customary Practice of the GATT in the Field of Dispute Settlement (Article XXIII:2)

1. Any dispute which has not been settled bilaterally under the relevant provisions of the General Agreement may be referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES¹ which are obliged, pursuant to Article XXIII:2, to investigate matters submitted to them and make appropriate recommendations or give a ruling on the matter as appropriate. Article XXIII:2 does not indicate whether disputes should be handled by a working party or by a panel.²

2. The CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted in 1966 a decision establishing the procedure to be followed for Article XXIII consultations between developed and less-developed contracting parties (BISD, 14th Supplement, page 18). This procedure provides, inter alia, for the Director-General to employ his good offices with a view to facilitating a solution, for setting up a panel with the task of examining the problem in order to recommend appropriate solutions, and for time-limits for the execution of the different parts of this procedure.

3. The function of a panel has normally been to review the facts of a case and the applicability of GATT provisions and to arrive at an objective assessment of these matters. In this connexion, panels have consulted regularly with the parties to the dispute and have given them adequate opportunity to develop a mutually satisfactory solution. Panels have taken appropriate account of the particular interests of developing countries. In cases of failure of the parties to reach a mutually satisfactory settlement, panels have normally given assistance to the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making recommendations or in giving rulings as envisaged in Article XXIII:2.

4. Before bringing a case, contracting parties have exercised their judgement as to whether action under Article XXIII:2 would be fruitful. Those cases which have come before the CONTRACTING PARTIES under this provision have, with few exceptions, been brought to a satisfactory conclusion. The aim of the CONTRACTING PARTIES has always been to secure a positive solution to a dispute. A solution mutually acceptable to the parties to a dispute is clearly to be preferred. In the absence of a mutually agreed solution, the first objective of the CONTRACTING PARTIES is usually to secure the withdrawal of the measures concerned if these are found to be inconsistent with the General Agreement. The provision of compensation should be resorted to only if the immediate withdrawal of the measure is impracticable and as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the measures which are inconsistent with the General Agreement. The last resort which Article XXIII provides to the country invoking this procedure is the possibility of suspending the application of concessions or other obligations on a discriminatory basis vis-a-vis the other contracting party, subject to authorization by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of such measures. Such action has only rarely been contemplated and cases taken under Article XXIII:2 have lead to such action in only one case.

5. In practice, contracting parties have had recourse to Article XXIII only when in their view a benefit accruing to them under the General Agreement was being nullified or impaired. In cases where there is an infringement of the obligations assumed under the General Agreement, the action is considered prima facie to constitute a case of nullification or impairment. A prima facie case of nullification or impairment would ipso facto require consideration of whether the circumstances are serious enough to justify the authorization of suspension of concessions or obligations, if the contracting party bringing the complaint so requests. This means that there is normally a presumption that a breach of the rules has an adverse impact on other contracting parties, and in such cases, it is up to the contracting parties against whom the complaint has been brought to rebut the charge. Paragraph 1(b) permits recourse to Article XXIII if nullification or impairment results from measures taken by other contracting parties whether or not these conflict with the provisions of the General Agreement, and paragraph 1(c) if any other situation exists. If a contracting party bringing an Article XXIII case claims that measures which do not conflict with the provisions of the General Agreement have nullified or impaired benefits accruing to it under the General Agreement, it would be called upon to provide a detailed justification.

6. Concerning the customary elements of the procedures regarding working parties and panels, the following elements have to be noted:

- (i) working parties are instituted by the Council upon the request of one or several contracting parties. The terms of reference of working parties are generally "to examine the matter in the light of the relevant provisions of the General Agreement and to report to the Council". Working parties set up their own working procedures. The practice for working parties has been to hold one or two meetings to examine the matter and a final meeting to discuss conclusions. Working parties are open to participation of any contracting party which has an interest in the matter. Generally working parties consist of a number of delegations varying from about five to twenty according to the importance of the question and the interests involved. The countries who are parties to the dispute are always members of the Working Party and have the same status as other delegations. The report of the Working Party represents the views of all its members and therefore records different views if necessary. Since the tendency is to strive for consensus, there is generally some measure of negotiation and compromise in the formulation of the Working Party's report. The Council adopts the report. The reports of working parties are advisory opinions on the basis of which the CONTRACTING PARTIES may take a final decision.
- (ii) In the case of disputes, the CONTRACTING PARTIES have established panels (which have been called by different names) or working parties in order to assist them in examining questions raised under Article XXIII:2. Since 1952, panels have become the usual procedure. However, the Council has taken such decisions only after the party concerned has had an occasion to study the complaint and prepare its response before the Council. The terms of reference are discussed and approved by the Council. Normally, these terms of reference are "to examine the matter and to make such findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making the recommendations or rulings provided for in paragraph 2 of Article XXIII". When a contracting party having recourse to Article XXIII:2 raised questions relating to the suspension of concessions or other obligations, the terms of reference were to examine the matter in accordance with the provisions of Article XXIII:2. Members of the panel are usually selected from permanent delegations or, less frequently, from the national administrations in the capitals amongst delegates who participate in GATT activities on a regular basis. The practice has been to appoint a member or members from developing countries when a dispute is between a developing and a developed country.
- (iii) Members of panels are expected to act impartially without instructions from their governments. In a few cases, in view of the nature and complexity of the matter, the parties concerned have agreed to designate non-government experts. Nominations are proposed to the parties concerned by the GATT secretariat. The composition of panels (three or five members depending on the case) has been agreed upon by the parties concerned and approved by the GATT Council. It is recognized that a broad spectrum of opinion has been beneficial in difficult cases, but that the number of panel members has sometimes delayed the composition of panels, and therefore the process of dispute settlement.
- (iv) Panels set up their own working procedures. The practice for the panels has been to hold two or three formal meetings with the parties concerned. The panel invited the parties to present their views either in writing and/or orally in the presence of each other. The panel can question both parties on any matter which it considers relevant to the dispute. Panels have also heard the views of any contracting party having a substantial interest in the matter, which is not directly party to the dispute, but which has expressed in the Council a desire to present its views. Written memoranda submitted to the panel have been considered confidential, but are made available to the parties to the dispute. Panels often consult with and seek information from any relevant source they deem appropriate and they sometimes consult experts to obtain their technical opinion on certain aspects of the matter. Panels may seek advice or assistance from the secretariat in its capacity as guardian of the General Agreement, especially on historical or procedural aspects. The secretariat provides the secretary and technical services for panels.

- (v) Where the parties have failed to develop a mutually satisfactory solution, the panel has submitted its findings in a written form. Panel reports have normally set out findings of fact, the applicability of relevant provisions, and the basic rationale behind any findings and recommendations that it has made. Where a bilateral settlement of the matter has been found, the report of the panel has been confined to a brief description of the case and to reporting that a solution has been reached.
- (vi) The reports of panels have been drafted in the absence of the parties in the light of the information and the statements made.
- (vii) To encourage development of mutually satisfactory solutions between the parties and with a view to obtaining their comments, each panel has normally first submitted the descriptive part of its report to the parties concerned, and also their conclusions, or an outline thereof, a reasonable period of time before they have been circulated to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
- (viii) In accordance with their terms of reference established by the CONTRACTING PARTIES panels have expressed their views on whether an infringement of certain rules of the General Agreement arises out of the measure examined. Panels have also, if so requested by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, formulated draft recommendations addressed to the parties. In yet other cases panels were invited to give a technical opinion on some precise aspect of the matter (e.g. on the modalities of a withdrawal or suspension in regard to the volume of trade involved). The opinions expressed by the panel members on the matter are anonymous and the panel deliberations are secret.
- (ix) Although the CONTRACTING PARTIES have never established precise deadlines for the different phases of the procedure, probably because the matters submitted to panels differ as to their complexity and their urgency, in most cases the proceedings of the panels have been completed within a reasonable period of time, extending from three to nine months.

The 1966 decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES referred to in paragraph 2 above lays down in its paragraph 7 that the Panel shall report within a period of sixty days from the date the matter was referred to it.

C. MINISTERIAL DECLARATION OF 29 NOVEMBER 1982, DECISION ON DISPUTE SETTLEMENT (29S/13)

The CONTRACTING PARTIES:

Agree that the Understanding on Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance negotiated during the Tokyo Round (hereinafter referred to as the "Understanding") provides the essential framework of procedures for the settlement of disputes among contracting parties and that no major change is required in this framework, but that there is scope for more effective use of the existing mechanism and for specific improvements in procedures to this end;

And agree further that:

- (i) With reference to paragraph 8 of the Understanding, if a dispute is not resolved through consultations, any party to a dispute may, with the agreement of the other party, seek the good offices of the Director-General or of an individual or group of persons nominated by the Director-General. This conciliatory process would be carried out expeditiously, and the Director-General would inform the Council of the outcome of the conciliatory process. Conciliation proceedings, and in particular positions taken by the parties to the dispute during consultations, shall be confidential, and without prejudice to the rights of either party in any further proceedings under Article XXIII:2. It would remain open at any time during any conciliatory process for either party to the dispute to refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
- (ii) In order to ensure more effective compliance with the provisions of paragraphs 11 and 12 of the Understanding, the Director-General shall inform the Council of any case in which it has not been found possible to meet the time-limits for the establishment of a panel.
- (iii) With reference to paragraph 13 of the Understanding, contracting parties will co-operate effectively with the Director-General in making suitably qualified experts available to serve on panels. Where experts are not drawn from Geneva, any expenses, including travel and subsistence allowance, shall be met from the GATT budget.
- (iv) The secretariat of GATT has the responsibility of assisting the panel, especially on the legal, historical and procedural aspects of the matters dealt with.
- (v) The terms of reference of a panel should be formulated so as to permit a clear finding with respect to any contravention of GATT provisions and/or on the question of nullification and impairment of benefits. In terms of paragraph 16 of the Understanding, and after reviewing the facts of the case, the applicability of GATT provisions and the arguments advanced, the panel should come to such a finding. Where a finding establishing a contravention of GATT provisions or nullification or impairment is made, the panel should make such suggestions as appropriate for dealing with the matter as would assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making recommendations to the contracting parties which they consider to be concerned, or give a ruling on the matter, as appropriate.

- (vi) Panels would aim to deliver their findings without undue delay, as provided in paragraph 20 of the Understanding. If a complete report cannot be made within the period foreseen in that paragraph, panels would be expected to so advise the Council and the report should be submitted as soon as possible thereafter.
- (vii) Reports of panels should be given prompt consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. Where a decision on the findings contained in a report calls for a ruling or a recommendation by the Council, the Council may allow the contracting party concerned a reasonable specified time to indicate what action it proposes to take with a view to a satisfactory settlement of the matter, before making any recommendation or ruling on the basis of the report.
- (viii) The recommendation or ruling made by the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall be aimed at achieving a satisfactory settlement of the matter in accordance with GATT obligations. In furtherance of the provisions of paragraph 22 of the Understanding the Council shall periodically review the action taken pursuant to such recommendations. The contracting party to which such a recommendation has been addressed, shall report within a reasonable specified period on action taken or on its reasons for not implementing the recommendation or ruling by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The contracting party bringing the case may also ask the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make suitable efforts with a view to finding an appropriate solution as provided in paragraph 22 of the Understanding.
- (ix) The further action taken by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the above circumstances might include a recommendation for compensatory adjustment with respect to other products or authorization for the suspension of such concessions or other obligations as foreseen in Article XXIII:2, as the CONTRACTING PARTIES may determine to be appropriate in the circumstances.
- (x) The Parties to a dispute would fully participate in the consideration of the matter by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under paragraph (viii) above, including the consideration of any rulings or recommendations the CONTRACTING PARTIES might make pursuant to Article XXIII:2 of the General Agreement, and their views would be fully recorded. They would likewise participate and have their views recorded in the considerations of the further actions provided for under paragraphs (viii) and (ix) above. The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirmed that consensus will continue to be the traditional method of resolving disputes; however, they agreed that obstruction in the process of dispute settlement shall be avoided.¹ It is understood that decisions in this process cannot add to or diminish the rights and obligations provided in the General Agreement.

Footnote 1 to paragraph (x) provides: This does not prejudice the provisions on decision making in the General Agreement.

D. DECISION ON DISPUTE SETTLEMENT OF 30 NOVEMBER 1984 (31S/9)

Formation of panels

1. Contracting parties should indicate to the Director-General the names of persons they think qualified to serve as panelists, who are not presently affiliated with national administrations but who have a high degree of knowledge of international trade and experience of the GATT. These names should be used to develop a short roster of non-governmental panelists to be agreed upon by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in consultation with the Director-General. The roster should be as representative as possible of contracting parties.
2. The Director-General should continue the practice of proposing panels composed preferably of governmental representatives but may also draw as necessary on persons on the approved roster. The parties should retain the ability to respond to the Director-General's proposal, but shall not oppose nominations except for compelling reasons.
3. In the event that panel composition cannot be agreed within thirty days after a matter is referred by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Director-General shall, at the request of either party and in consultation with the Chairman of the Council, complete the panel by appointing persons from the roster of non-governmental panelists to resolve the deadlock, after consulting both parties.

Completion of panel work

1. Panels should continue to set their own working procedures and, where possible, panels should provide the parties to the dispute at the outset with a proposed calendar for the panel's work.
2. Where written submissions are requested from the parties, panels should set precise deadlines, and parties to a dispute should respect those deadlines.

E. DECISION OF 12 APRIL 1989 ON IMPROVEMENTS TO THE GATT DISPUTE SETTLEMENT RULES AND PROCEDURES (36S/61)

Following the meetings of the Trade Negotiations Committee at Ministerial level in December 1988 and at the level of high officials in April 1989, the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

Approve the improvements of the GATT dispute settlement rules and procedures set out below and their application on the basis set out in this Decision:

A. General Provisions

1. Contracting parties recognize that the dispute settlement system of GATT serves to preserve the rights and obligations of contracting parties under the General Agreement and to clarify the existing provisions of the General Agreement. It is a central element in providing security and predictability to the multilateral trading system.

2. Contracting parties agree that all solutions to matters formally raised under the GATT dispute settlement system under Articles XXII, XXIII and arbitration awards shall be consistent with the General Agreement and shall not nullify or impair benefits accruing to any contracting party under the General Agreement, nor impede the attainment of any objective of the General Agreement.

3. Contracting parties agree that the existing rules and procedures of the GATT in the field of dispute settlement shall continue. It is further agreed that the improvements set out below, which aim to ensure prompt and effective resolution of disputes to the benefit of all contracting parties, shall be applied on a trial basis from 1 May 1989 to the end of the Uruguay Round in respect of complaints brought during that period under Article XXII or XXIII; it is also agreed to keep the application of these improvements under review during the remainder of the Round and to decide on their adoption before the end of the Round; to continue negotiations with the aim of further improving and strengthening the GATT dispute settlement system taking into account the experience gained in the application of these improvements.

4. All the points set out in this Decision shall be applied without prejudice to any provision on special and differential treatment for developing contracting parties in the existing instruments on dispute settlement including the CONTRACTING PARTIES' Decision of 5 April 1966 (BISD 14S/18).

B. Notification

Mutually agreed solutions to matters formally raised under GATT Articles XXII and XXIII, as well as arbitration awards within GATT, must be notified to the Council where any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto.

C. Consultations

1. If a request is made under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1, the contracting party to which the request is made shall, unless otherwise mutually agreed, reply to the request within ten days after its receipt and shall enter into consultations in good faith within a period of no more than thirty days from the date of the request, with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory solution. If the contracting party does not respond within ten days, or does not enter into consultations within a period of no more than thirty days, or a period otherwise mutually agreed, from the date of the request, then the contracting party that requested the holding of consultations may proceed directly to request the establishment of a panel or a working party.

2. If the consultations under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1 fail to settle a dispute within sixty days after the request for consultations, the complaining party may request the establishment of a panel or a working party under Article XXIII:2. The complaining party may request a panel or a working party during the sixty-day period if the parties jointly consider that consultations have failed to settle the dispute.

3. Requests for consultations under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1 shall be notified to the Council by the party which requests consultations. Any request for consultations shall be submitted in writing and shall give the reasons for the request.

4. In cases of urgency, including those which concern perishable goods en route, parties shall enter into consultations within a period of no more than ten days from the date of the request. If the consultations have failed to settle the dispute within a period of thirty days after the request, the complaining party may request the establishment of a panel or a working party.

D. Good Offices, Conciliation, Mediation

1. Good offices, conciliation and mediation are procedures that are undertaken voluntarily if the parties to the dispute so agree. They may be requested at any time by any party to a dispute. They may begin at any time and be terminated at any time. Once terminated, the complaining party can then proceed with a request for the establishment of a panel or a working party under Article XXIII:2. When good offices, conciliation or mediation are entered into within sixty days of a request for consultations, the complaining party must allow a period of sixty days from the date of the request for consultations before requesting the establishment of a panel or working party. The complaining party may request a panel or a working party during the sixty days if the parties to the dispute jointly consider that the good offices, conciliation or mediation process has failed to settle the dispute.

2. If the parties to a dispute agree, procedures for good offices, conciliation or mediation may continue while the panel or working party process proceeds.

3. The Director-General may, acting in an ex officio capacity, offer his good offices, conciliation or mediation with the view to assisting contracting parties to settle a dispute.

E. Arbitration

1. Expeditious arbitration within GATT as an alternative means of dispute settlement can facilitate the solution of certain disputes that concern issues that are clearly defined by both parties.

2. Resort to arbitration shall be subject to mutual agreement of the parties which shall agree on the procedures to be followed. Agreements to resort to arbitration shall be notified to all contracting parties sufficiently in advance of the actual commencement of the arbitration process.

3. Other contracting parties may become party to an arbitration proceeding upon the agreement of the parties which have agreed to have recourse to arbitration. The parties to the proceeding shall agree to abide by the arbitration award.

F. Panel and Working Party Procedures

(a) Establishment of a Panel or a Working Party

The request for a panel or a working party shall be made in writing. It shall indicate whether consultations were held, and provide a brief summary of the factual and legal basis of the complaint sufficient to present the problem clearly. In case the applicant requests the establishment of a panel or a working party with other than standard terms of reference, the written request shall include the proposed text of special terms of reference. If the complaining party so requests, a decision to establish a panel or working party shall be taken at the latest at the Council meeting following that at which the request first appeared as an item on the Council's regular agenda, unless at that meeting the Council decides otherwise.*

(b) Standard Terms of Reference

1. Panels shall have the following terms of reference unless the parties to the dispute agree otherwise within twenty days from the establishment of the panel:

"To examine, in the light of the relevant GATT provisions, the matter referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES by (name of contracting party) in document L/... and to make such findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making the recommendations or in giving the rulings provided for in Article XXIII:2".

2. In establishing a panel, the Council may authorize its Chairman to draw up the terms of reference of the panel in consultation with the parties subject to the provisions of the preceding paragraph. The terms of reference thus drawn up shall be circulated to all contracting parties. If other than standard terms of reference are agreed upon, any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto in the Council.

(c) Composition of Panels

1. Contracting parties shall undertake, as a general rule, to permit their representatives to serve as panel members.

2. Panels shall be composed of well-qualified governmental and/or non-governmental individuals.

3. The roster of non-governmental panelists shall be expanded and improved. To this end, contracting parties may nominate individuals to serve on panels and shall provide relevant information on their nominee's knowledge of international trade and of the GATT.

4. Panels shall be composed of three members unless the parties to the dispute agree, within ten days from the establishment of the panel, to a panel composed of five members.

5. If there is no agreement on the members within twenty days from the establishment of a panel, at the request of either party, the Director-General, in consultation with the Chairman of the Council, shall form the panel by appointing the panelists whom he considers most appropriate, after consulting both parties. The Director-General shall inform the contracting parties of the composition of the panel thus formed no later than ten days from the date he receives such a request.

(d) Procedures for Multiple Complainants

1. Where more than one contracting party requests the establishment of a panel related to the same matter, a single panel may be established to examine these complaints taking into account the rights of all parties concerned. A single panel should be established to examine such complaints whenever feasible.

2. The single panel will organize its examination and present its findings to the Council so that the rights which the parties to the dispute would have enjoyed had separate panels examined the complaints are in no way impaired. If one of the parties to the dispute so requests, the panel will submit separate reports on the dispute concerned. The written submissions by each of the complainants will be made available to the other complainants, and each complainant will have the right to be present when one of the other complainants presents its view to the panel.

3. If more than one panel is established to examine the complaints related to the same matter, to the greatest extent possible the same persons shall serve as panelists on each of the separate panels and the timetable for the panel process in such disputes shall be harmonized.

(e) Third Contracting Parties

1. The interests of the parties to a dispute and those of other contracting parties shall be fully taken into account during the panel process.

2. Any third contracting party having a substantial interest in a matter before a panel, and having notified this to the Council, shall have an opportunity to be heard by the panel and to make written submissions to the panel. These submissions shall also be given to the parties to the dispute and shall be reflected in the panel report.

3. At the request of the third contracting party, the panel may grant the third contracting party access to the written submissions to the panel by those parties to the dispute which have agreed to the disclosure of their respective submission to the third contracting party.

(f) Time Devoted to Various Phases of a Panel

1. Panel procedures should provide sufficient flexibility so as to ensure high-quality panel reports, while not unduly delaying the panel process.

2. Panels shall follow the Suggested Working Procedures found in the July 1985 note of the Office of Legal Affairs unless the members of the panel agree otherwise after consulting the parties to the dispute. After consulting the parties, the panel members shall, as soon as practicable and whenever possible within one week after the composition and terms of reference of the panel have been agreed upon, fix the timetable for the panel process at least until its first substantive meeting.

3. In determining the timetable for the panel process, the panel shall provide sufficient time for the parties to the dispute to prepare their submissions.

4. Each party to the dispute shall deposit its written submissions with the Secretariat for immediate transmission to the panel and to the other party or parties to the dispute. The complaining party shall submit its first submission in advance of the responding party's first submission unless the panel decides, in fixing the timetable referred to in the second paragraph of this section and after consultations with the parties to the dispute, that the parties should submit their first submissions simultaneously. When there are sequential arrangements for the deposit of first submissions, the panel shall establish a firm time period for receipt of the responding party's submission. Any subsequent written submissions shall be submitted simultaneously.

5. In order to make the procedures more efficient, the period in which the panel shall conduct its examination, from the time the composition and terms of reference of the panel have been agreed upon to the time when the final report is provided to the parties to the dispute, shall, as a general rule, not exceed six months. In cases of urgency, including those relating to perishable goods, the panel shall aim to provide its report to the parties within three months.

6. When the panel considers that it cannot provide its report within six months, or within three months in cases of urgency, it shall inform the Council in writing of the reasons for the delay together with an estimate of the period within which it will submit its report. In no case should the period from the establishment of the panel to the submission of the report to the contracting parties exceed nine months.

7. In the context of consultations involving a measure taken by a developing contracting party, the parties may agree to extend the periods established in paragraphs 2 and 4 of Section C. If, after the relevant period has elapsed, the parties cannot agree that the consultations have concluded, the Chairman of the Council shall decide, after consultation with the parties, whether to extend the relevant period and, if so, for how long. In addition, in examining a complaint against a developing contracting party, the panel shall accord sufficient time for the developing contracting party to prepare and present its argumentation. The provisions of paragraph 4 of Section G are not affected by any action pursuant to this paragraph.

G. Adoption of Panel Reports

1. In order to provide sufficient time for the members of the Council to consider panel reports, the reports shall not be considered for adoption by the Council until thirty days after they have been issued to the contracting parties.

2. Contracting parties having objections to panel reports shall give written reasons to explain their objections for circulation at least ten days prior to the Council meeting at which the panel report will be considered.

3. The parties to a dispute shall have the right to participate fully in the consideration of the panel report by the Council, and their views shall be fully recorded. The practice of adopting panel reports by consensus shall be continued, without prejudice to the GATT provisions on decision-making which remain applicable. However, the delaying of the process of dispute settlement shall be avoided.

4. The period from the request under Article XXII:1 or Article XXIII:1 until the Council takes a decision on the panel report shall not, unless agreed to by the parties, exceed fifteen months. The provisions of this paragraph shall not affect the provisions of paragraph 6 of Section F(f).

H. Technical Assistance

1. While the Secretariat assists contracting parties in respect of dispute settlement at their request, there may also be a need to provide additional legal advice and assistance in respect of dispute settlement to developing contracting parties. To this end, the Secretariat shall make available a qualified legal expert within the Technical Co-operation Division to any developing contracting party which so requests. This expert shall assist the developing contracting party in a manner ensuring the continued impartiality of the Secretariat.

2. The Secretariat shall conduct special training courses for interested contracting parties concerning GATT dispute settlement procedures and practices so as to enable contracting parties' experts to be better informed in this regard.

I. Surveillance of Implementation of Recommendations and Rulings

1. Prompt compliance with recommendations or rulings of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXIII is essential in order to ensure effective resolution of disputes to the benefit of all contracting parties.

2. The contracting party concerned shall inform the Council of its intentions in respect of implementation of the recommendations or rulings. If it is impracticable to comply immediately with the recommendations or rulings, the contracting party concerned shall have a reasonable period of time in which to do so.

3. The Council shall monitor the implementation of recommendations or rulings adopted under Article XXIII:2. The issue of implementation of the recommendations or rulings may be raised at the Council by any contracting party at any time following their adoption. Unless the Council decides otherwise, the issue of implementation of the recommendations or rulings shall be on the agenda of the Council meeting after six months following their adoption and shall remain on the Council's agenda until the issue is resolved. At least ten days prior to each such Council meeting, the contracting party concerned shall provide the Council with a status report in writing of its progress in the implementation of the panel recommendations or rulings.

4. In cases brought by developing contracting parties, the Council shall consider what further action it might take which would be appropriate to the circumstances, in conformity with paragraphs 21 and 23 of the 1979 Understanding regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance (BISD 26S/214).

The footnote to paragraph F(a) provides: References to the Council, made in this paragraph as well as in the following paragraphs, are without prejudice to the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, for which the Council is empowered to act in accordance with normal GATT practice (BISD 26S/215).

F. DECISION OF 22 FEBRUARY 1994 ON EXTENSION OF THE APRIL 1989 DECISION ON IMPROVEMENTS TO THE GATT DISPUTE SETTLEMENT RULES AND PROCEDURES (L/7416)

The CONTRACTING PARTIES,

Recalling their Decision of 12 April 1989 (BISD 36S/61),

Noting that the improvements to the GATT dispute settlement rules and procedures are being applied on a trial basis until the end of the Uruguay Round and that a decision on their adoption should be taken before the end of the Round,

Considering that the continuation of the improved rules and procedures is necessary for the effectiveness of the dispute settlement mechanism,

Decide,

To keep the above-mentioned improvements in effect until the entry into force of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes contained in Annex 2 of the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization (MTN/FA, II).

NOTE: The April 1989 Decision was not extended before the WTO Agreement entered into force on 1 January 1995, and therefore expired as of that date.

G. DECISION OF 5 APRIL 1966 ON PROCEDURES UNDER ARTICLE XXIII (14S/18)

The CONTRACTING PARTIES,

Recognizing that the prompt settlement of situations in which a contracting party considers that any benefits accruing to it directly or indirectly from the General Agreement are being impaired by measures taken by another contracting party, is essential to the effective functioning of the General Agreement and the maintenance of a proper balance between the rights and obligations of all contracting parties;

Recognizing further that the existence of such a situation can cause severe damage to the trade and economic development of the less-developed contracting parties; and

Affirming their resolve to facilitate the solution of such situations while taking fully into account the need for safeguarding both the present and potential trade of less-developed contracting parties affected by such measures;

Decide that:

1. If consultations between a less-developed contracting party and a developed contracting party in regard to any matter falling under paragraph 1 of Article XXIII do not lead to a satisfactory settlement, the less-developed contracting party complaining of the measures may refer the matter which is the subject of consultations to the Director-General so that, acting in an ex officio capacity, he may use his good offices with a view to facilitating a solution.
 2. To this effect the contracting parties concerned shall, at the request of the Director-General, promptly furnish all relevant information.
 3. On receipt of this information, the Director-General shall consult with the contracting parties concerned and with such other contracting parties or inter-governmental organizations as he considers appropriate with a view to promoting a mutually acceptable solution.
 4. After a period of two months from the commencement of the consultations referred to in paragraph 3 above, if no mutually satisfactory solution has been reached, the Director-General shall, at the request of one of the contracting parties concerned, bring the matter to the attention of the CONTRACTING PARTIES or the Council, to whom he shall submit a report on the action taken by him, together with all background information.
 5. Upon receipt of the report, the CONTRACTING PARTIES or the Council shall forthwith appoint a panel of experts to examine the matter with a view to recommending appropriate solution. The members of the panel shall act on a personal capacity and shall be appointed in consultation with, and with the approval of, the contracting parties concerned.
 6. In conducting its examination and having before it all the background information, the panel shall take due account of all the circumstances and considerations relating to the application of the measures complained of, and their impact on the trade and economic development of affected contracting parties.
 7. The panel shall, within a period of sixty days from the date the matter was referred to it, submit its findings and recommendations to the CONTRACTING PARTIES or to the Council, for consideration and decision. Where the matter is referred to the Council, it may, in accordance with Rule 8 of the Intersessional Procedures adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES at their thirteenth session¹, address its recommendations directly to the interested contracting parties and concurrently report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
 8. Within a period of ninety days from the date of the decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, or the Council, the contracting party to which a recommendation is directed shall report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES or the Council on the action taken by it in pursuance of the decision.
 9. If on examination of this report it is found that a contracting party to which a recommendation has been directed has not complied in full with the relevant recommendation of the CONTRACTING PARTIES or the Council, and that any benefit accruing directly or indirectly under the General Agreement continues in consequence to be nullified or impaired, and that the circumstances are serious enough to justify such action, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may authorize the affected contracting party or parties to suspend, in regard to the contracting party causing the damage, application of any concession or any other obligation under the General Agreement whose suspension is considered warranted, taking account of the circumstances.
 10. In the event that a recommendation to a developed country by the CONTRACTING PARTIES is not applied within the time-limit prescribed in paragraph 8, the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall consider what measures, further to those undertaken under paragraph 9, should be taken to resolve the matter.
 11. If consultations, held under paragraph 2 of Article XXXVII, relate to restrictions for which there is no authority under any provisions to the General Agreement, any of the parties to the consultations may, in the absence of a satisfactory solution, request that consultations be carried out by the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 2 of Article XXIII and in accordance with the procedures set out in the present decision, it being understood that a consultation held under paragraph 2 of Article XXXVII in respect of such restrictions will be considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as fulfilling the conditions of paragraph 1 of Article XXIII if the parties to the consultations so agree.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXIII

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXIII

The provisions of Article XXIII are essentially the same as those agreed in Geneva in 1947. However, these provisions have been supplemented by a number of decisions and understandings agreed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the texts of which are provided above:

- the “Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance” of 28 November 1979 and its annexed “Agreed Description of the Customary Practice of the GATT in the Field of Dispute Settlement” (referred to below as the “1979 Understanding” and its “Annex on customary practice”), which were agreed in the Tokyo Round.² Paragraph 7 of the 1979 Understanding provides, inter alia, “that the customary practice of the GATT in the field of dispute settlement, described in the Annex, should be continued in the future with the improvements set out below”;
- the Decision on “Dispute Settlement Procedures” of 29 November 1982 (“1982 Decision”), adopted at the Thirty-eighth Session which was held at Ministerial level in November 1982;³
- the Decision on “Dispute Settlement Procedures” of 30 November 1984 (“1984 Decision”), adopted at the Fortieth Session;⁴
- the Decision on “Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures” (“1989 Improvements”), negotiated at the December 1988 Meeting of the Trade Negotiations Committee of the Uruguay Round and adopted on 12 April 1989; and
- the Decision of 5 April 1966 on “Procedures under Article XXIII” (“1966 Procedures”) applying to disputes between a developing contracting party and a developed contracting party;
- The Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes (“Dispute Settlement Understanding”), agreed in the Uruguay Round, and included as Annex 2 of the WTO Agreement.

On 22 February 1994 the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided to keep the 1989 Improvements in effect until the entry into force of WTO Agreement. The 1989 Improvements were not extended before the WTO Agreement entered into force on 1 January 1995, and have expired.

This chapter cites decisions, examples and precedents with regard to dispute settlement practice under the General Agreement and the Tokyo Round Agreements, but does not discuss the Dispute Settlement Understanding.

1. Scope of Article XXIII

See also the material below in Section B under “Scope of panel proceeding”.

(1) Matters not within the competence of the GATT

The Report of the Panel on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act” notes that in discussion of the request by the United States for a panel in this case, “At the Council meeting, a number of delegations expressed doubts whether the dispute between the United States and Canada was one for which the GATT had competence since it involved investment legislation, a subject not covered by the GATT. ... The representative of the United States said that his government was not calling into question the Canadian investment legislation as such but was complaining about the two specific trade-related issues mentioned in the terms of reference. The representative of Canada said that ... the terms of reference ensured that the examination would touch only on trade matters within the purview of GATT. The Chairman suggested, and the Council so decided, that the terms of reference remain as they stood, and that the reservations and statements made be placed on the record and that it be presumed that the panel would be limited in its activities and findings to within the four corners of GATT”.⁵ The Panel findings note that “In view of the fact that the General Agreement does not prevent Canada from exercising its sovereign right to regulate foreign direct investments, the Panel examined the purchase and export undertakings by investors subject to the Foreign Investment Review Act of Canada solely in the light of Canada’s trade obligations under the General Agreement”.⁶

See also the material below at page 730 on the related but separate issue of interpretation of the standard provision in terms of reference concerning panel examination of matters “in the light of the relevant GATT provisions”.

(2) Disputes involving countries or territories which are not contracting parties

A Secretariat Note describing GATT practice relating to de facto application of the General Agreement notes as follows:

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES do not assist in the resolution of disputes on the interpretation or application of the General Agreement that might arise between contracting parties and countries applying the General Agreement on a de facto basis. Article XXIII:2 is not applied to such disputes (cf. VAL/M/8, page 2, for a legal opinion on this issue by the Secretariat).⁷”

The Minutes referred to, of the November 1983 meeting of the Committee on Customs Valuation, note:

“Responding to a query regarding the significance of the reference to GATT Article XXIII in Article 20.11 of the Code, the Director of the Office of Legal Affairs said that this Article stipulated that Parties should use the dispute settlement procedures under the Agreement before availing themselves of any rights which they had under the GATT. It was thus recognized in the provision that there might not be invocable rights under the GATT; this would apply in the case of a dispute involving a country which, like Botswana, was neither a GATT contracting party nor had provisionally acceded to the GATT”.⁸

At its March 1992 meeting, the Council agreed to the request of Yugoslavia for establishment of a panel on “EEC - Trade Measures for Non-economic Reasons”.⁹ At the April 1992 Council meeting, in discussion of the notification of the transformation of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia into the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia consisting of the Republics of Serbia and Montenegro, the EC representative said that until the question of succession to Yugoslavia’s contracting party status had been resolved, the Panel process which had been initiated between the former SFRY and the EC no longer had any foundation and could not proceed.¹⁰ See also the material on the status of Yugoslavia under Articles XXV and XXXII.

On the other hand, disputes have been brought by contracting parties on behalf of territories for which they had international responsibility at the time, and in respect of which they had agreed to apply provisionally the General Agreement under the Protocol of Provisional Application: for instance, the disputes on “Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Textile Products” and “EEC - Quantitative Restrictions against Imports of Certain Products from Hong Kong”, which were brought by the United Kingdom on behalf of Hong Kong, and the dispute on “United States - Import Restrictions on Tuna” which was brought by the Netherlands on behalf of the Netherlands Antilles.¹¹

(3) Discretionary legislation

The 1957 Report on “The European Economic Community” notes, concerning the EEC Treaty provisions relating to quantitative restrictions, that “the Sub-Group noted that these provisions were not mandatory and imposed on the Members of the Community no obligation to take action which would be inconsistent with the General Agreement. On the other hand because of the very general scope and competence conferred on the institutions of the Community, it could be within their powers to take measures which could be inconsistent with the GATT whatever the interpretation given to the provisions of Article XXIV. The Six pointed out that many contracting parties had permissive legislation of a general character which, if implemented in full, would enable them to impose restrictions in a manner contrary to Article XI. These countries were not, however, required to consult with the CONTRACTING PARTIES about their possible intentions as regards the implementation of such legislation”.¹²

The 1987 Panel Report on “United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances” examined excise taxes on imported petroleum and certain imported chemical substances (“Superfund taxes”), which had been enacted as a revenue source for the US “Superfund” hazardous-waste cleanup program. The tax on certain imported substances, enacted in October 1986, provided that it would not enter into effect until 1 January 1989, and regulations implementing it had not been drafted or put into effect. The Panel Report examined, with respect to the tax on certain imported substances, a requirement that importers supply sufficient information regarding the chemical inputs of taxable substances to enable the tax authorities to determine the amount of tax to be imposed; otherwise a penalty tax would be imposed in the amount of five percent ad valorem, or a different rate to be prescribed by the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury which would equal the amount that would be imposed if the substance were produced using the predominant method of production. The Panel noted concerning the penalty rate:

“... the Superfund Act permits the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe by regulation, in lieu of the 5 per cent rate, a rate which would equal the amount that would be imposed if the substance were produced using the predominant method of production. ... These regulations have not yet been issued. Thus, whether they will eliminate the need to impose the penalty tax and whether they will establish complete equivalence between domestic and imported products, as required by Article III:2, first sentence, remain open questions. From the perspective of the overall objectives of the General Agreement it is regrettable that the Superfund Act explicitly directs the United States tax authorities to impose a tax inconsistent with the national treatment principle but, since the Superfund Act also gives them the possibility to avoid the need to impose that tax by issuing regulations, the existence of the penalty rate provisions as such does not constitute a violation of the United States obligations under the General Agreement. The Panel noted with satisfaction the statement of the United States that, given the tax authorities’ regulatory authority under the Act, ‘in all probability the 5 per cent penalty rate would never be applied’ ...”.¹³

In the 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Regulation on Imports of Parts and Components” the Panel examined an argument of Japan concerning the anti-circumvention provision in the EEC anti-dumping legislation:

“Japan considers not only the measures taken under the anti-circumvention provision but also the provision itself to be violating the EEC’s obligations under the General Agreement. Japan therefore asked the Panel to recommend to the CONTRACTING PARTIES that they request the EEC not only to revoke the measures taken under the provision but also to withdraw the provision itself. The Panel therefore examined whether the mere existence of the anti-circumvention provision is inconsistent with the General Agreement. The Panel noted that the anti-circumvention provision does not mandate the imposition of duties or other measures by the EEC Commission and Council; it merely authorizes the Commission and the Council to take certain actions. Under the provisions of the General Agreement which Japan claims to have been violated by the EEC contracting parties are to avoid certain measures; but these provisions do not establish the obligation to avoid legislation under which the executive authorities may possibly impose such measures

“In the light of the above the Panel found that the mere existence of the anti-circumvention provision in the EEC’s anti-dumping Regulation is not inconsistent with the EEC’s obligations under the General Agreement. Although it would, from the perspective of the overall objectives of the General Agreement, be desirable if the EEC were to withdraw the anti-circumvention provision, the EEC would meet its obligations under the General Agreement if it were to cease to apply the provision in respect of contracting parties".¹⁴

The 1990 Panel Report on "Thailand - Restrictions on Importation of and Internal Taxes on Cigarettes" examined, inter alia, whether excise taxes which could be levied by Thai authorities on foreign cigarettes, as well as the exemption from Thai business and municipal taxes accorded in respect of cigarettes made from domestic leaf, were consistent with Article III. While the ceiling tax rates permitted under law were higher for imported than for domestic cigarettes, and the tax rate applied until 11 July 1990 varied in proportion to foreign tobacco content, the Thai Ministry of Finance had issued a regulation on 11 July 1990 to provide a uniform excise tax rate for all cigarettes. On 18 August 1990 Thailand modified its regulations to exempt all cigarettes from business and municipal taxes.

"... The United States argued that it was not sufficient under Article III for the rates effectively levied to be the same; the maximum rates that could be levied under the legislation also had to be non-discriminatory. The Panel noted that previous panels had found that legislation mandatorily requiring the executive authority to impose internal taxes discriminating against imported products was inconsistent with Article III:2, whether or not an occasion for its actual application had as yet arisen; legislation merely giving the executive the possibility to act inconsistently with Article III:2 could not, by itself, constitute a violation of that provision.¹⁵ The Panel agreed with the above reasoning and found that the possibility that the Tobacco Act might be applied contrary to Article III:2 was not sufficient to make it inconsistent with the General Agreement.¹⁶

"... The Panel observed that the new Thai measure, by eliminating business and municipal taxes on cigarettes, removed the internal taxes imposed on imported cigarettes in excess of those applied to domestic cigarettes. The Panel noted that, as in the case of the excise tax, the Tobacco Act continued to enable the executive authorities to levy the discriminatory taxes. However, the Panel, recalling its findings on the issue of excise taxes, found that the possibility that the Tobacco Act might be applied contrary to Article III:2 was, by itself, not sufficient to make it inconsistent with the General Agreement."¹⁷

The Panel concluded that "The current regulations relating to the excise, business and municipal taxes on cigarettes are consistent with Thailand's obligations under Article III of the General Agreement".¹⁸

The 1991 Panel Report on "United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna", which has not been adopted, examined inter alia the application in connection with the US Marine Mammal Protection Act (MMPA) of Section 8 of the Fishermen's Protective Act, which provided discretionary authority for the President to order a prohibition of imports of fish products "for such duration as the President determines appropriate and to the extent that such prohibition is sanctioned by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade".

"The Panel recalled that Mexico had also argued that the possible extension of import prohibitions to all fish products of Mexico under Section 101(a)(2)(D) of the MMPA and Section 8 of the Fishermen's Protective Act (the Pelly Amendment) was inconsistent with Article XI. The Panel noted that the Pelly Amendment authorised such an embargo, but gave the United States authorities discretion to refrain from taking any trade measures at all. Such an embargo was not now in effect, and might not be imposed by the United States authorities. In the Panel's view, therefore, the question presented to it was whether a statutory provision that authorises but does not require a measure inconsistent with the General Agreement constituted in itself a measure in conflict with the General Agreement.

"The Panel recalled that it had been recognised by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in previous cases that legislation mandatorily requiring the executive authority of a contracting party to act inconsistently with the General Agreement may be found to be inconsistent with that contracting party's obligations under the General Agreement, whether or not an occasion for its actual application has yet arisen, but on the other hand, legislation merely giving those executive authorities the power to act inconsistently with the General Agreement is not, in itself, inconsistent with the General Agreement.¹⁹ Accordingly, the Panel found that, because the Pelly Amendment did not require trade measures to be taken, this provision as such was not inconsistent with the General Agreement.²⁰

See also in this connection the unadopted 1992 panel report on "United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna".²¹

In the 1994 Panel Report on "United States - Measures Affecting the Importation, Internal Sale and Use of Tobacco",

"The Panel first noted that Article VIII:1(a) prohibits the imposition of fees imposed on or in connection with importation which are in excess of the cost of services rendered. In view of the fact that USDA had as yet not amended its inspection fee structure in line with the statutory amendment of Section 1106(c), the main question that arose for the Panel's analysis was whether this section of the 1993 Budget Act mandated action inconsistent with Article VIII or whether it merely gave the U.S. Government the discretion to act inconsistently with Article VIII. In this regard, the Panel recalled that panels had consistently ruled that legislation which mandated action inconsistent with the General Agreement could be challenged as such, whereas legislation which merely gave the discretion to the executive authority of a contracting party to act inconsistently with the General Agreement could not be challenged as such; only the actual application of such legislation inconsistent with the General Agreement could be subject to challenge."²²

"The Panel considered that if USDA had the discretion to lower its fees for inspection of domestic tobacco to a level comparable to the cost of services rendered for inspection of imported tobacco or to otherwise determine that the fees for inspecting imported and domestic tobacco were comparable, such action would permit the U.S. Government to avoid inconsistency with Article VIII:1(a).

"Considering these various arguments and the evidence of record, the Panel noted that there was no clear interpretation on the meaning of the term 'comparable' as used in the 1993 legislative amendment. It appeared to the Panel that the term 'comparable', including the ordinary meaning thereof, was susceptible of a range of meanings. The Panel considered that this range of meanings could encompass the interpretation advanced by the United States in this proceeding, an interpretation which would potentially enable USDA to comply with the obligation of Article VIII:1(a) not to impose fees in excess of the cost of services rendered, while at the same time meeting the comparability requirement of Section 1106(c) of the 1993 Budget Act. This being the case, and given that the United States had as yet neither changed the fee structure nor promulgated rules implementing Section 1106(c), the Panel found that it was not demonstrated that Section 1106(c) could not be applied in a manner ensuring that the fees charged for inspecting imported tobacco were not in excess of the cost of services rendered".²³

(4) Measures not yet in effect

The Panel on “United States - Definition of Industry Concerning Wine and Grape Products” examined a dispute concerning 1984 legislation which amended the definition of industry for the purposes of antidumping and countervailing duty investigations of wine and grape products. The Panel was established in February 1985. In September 1985, a preliminary countervailing duty investigation of certain wine imports was instituted in response to a petition by grape growers. On 28 October 1985, the US International Trade Commission (USITC) found that there was no reasonable indication of material injury, threat of material injury or material retardation of establishment, to the US industry as defined in this legislation; the investigation was terminated and no countervailing duty was levied. In November 1985 this determination was appealed in US domestic courts; if the appeal had been successful a court decision could have required resumption of the investigation. The Panel findings note as follows:

“The first question which the Panel considered in the course of its work was the request made by the US delegation that the Panel suspend the proceedings until such time, if any, as a countervailing-duty investigation under the law at issue were resumed. The Panel noted that the decision by the Committee to establish the Panel was taken at a time (i.e. on 15 February 1985) when neither such an investigation had been initiated nor even a complaint had been lodged. The Panel noted that it had been called upon, in its terms of reference, to review the facts of the matter referred to the Committee by the EEC in document SCM/54, and that the issue raised in this document was the conformity of the US law in question (i.e. Section 612(a)(1) of the Trade and Tariff Act of 1984) as such with the provisions of the Code, as required by its Article 19:5(a). The Panel had thus no option but to proceed with its work, as provided for in its terms of reference, irrespective of whether any concrete countervailing duty investigation was under way or whether any countervailing duties based on the above-noted provision were being or had been levied. The Panel was aware of the understanding of the Committee Chairman that it would, in its work, take into account any actual implementation of the legislation in question by the competent authorities of the United States ... The Panel noted in this connection that the USITC in its decision of 28 October 1985 had in fact applied this legislation by stating that in that particular case the US industry was composed of the wineries producing the like product and the grape-growers whose grapes were used in the like product. The Panel therefore proceeded to the examination of the conformity of the law in question with the provisions of the Code”.²⁶

When this Panel Report was adopted on 28 April 1992, the United States representative noted that “in accepting this Panel report, the United States reserved its position of opposition to the Panel’s view that it was ripe for the Panel to consider a matter that did not involve an actual initiation of an action, but rather an abstract question of whether a proceeding, if initiated, would have been consistent with the Subsidies Code”.²⁷

The 1987 Panel Report on “United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances” examined excise taxes on imported petroleum and certain imported chemical substances (“Superfund taxes”), which had been enacted as a revenue source for the US “Superfund” hazardous-waste cleanup program. The tax on certain imported substances, enacted in October 1986, provided that it would not enter into effect until 1 January 1989, and regulations implementing it had not been drafted or put into effect.

“The Panel noted that the United States objected to an examination of this tax because it did not go into effect before 1 January 1989, and - having no immediate effect on trade and therefore not causing nullification or impairment - fell outside the framework of Article XXIII. The Panel examined this point and concluded the following.

“... The general prohibition of quantitative restrictions under Article XI ... and the national treatment obligation of Article III ... have essentially the same rationale, namely to protect expectations of the contracting parties as to the competitive relationship between their products and those of the other contracting parties. Both articles are not only to protect current trade but also to create the predictability needed to plan future trade. That objective could not be attained if contracting parties could not challenge existing legislation mandating actions at variance with the General Agreement until the administrative acts implementing it had actually been applied to their trade. Just as the very existence of a regulation providing for a quota, without it restricting particular imports, has been recognized to constitute a violation of Article XI:1, the very existence of mandatory legislation providing for an internal tax, without it being applied to a particular imported product, should be regarded as falling within the scope of Article III:2, first sentence. The Panel noted that the tax on certain imported substances had been enacted, that the legislation was mandatory and that the tax authorities had to apply it after the end of next year and hence within a time frame within which the trade and investment decisions that could be influenced by the tax are taken. The Panel therefore concluded that Canada and the EEC were entitled to an investigation of their claim that this tax did not meet the criteria of Article III:2, first sentence.”²⁸

In June 1992, Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela requested consultations with the EC under Article XXII:1 concerning, inter alia, a proposal for a unified import regime for bananas adopted by the EC Commission. The EC responded that “the future common import regime for bananas is presently under preparation ... The present preparatory work can therefore not be considered as a measure under Articles XXII:1 or XXIII:1 of the General Agreement allowing for formal consultations under one of these provisions”.²⁹

(5) Measures no longer in effect

The Panel on “EEC - Measures on Animal Feed Proteins” was established on 17 September 1976 to examine EEC measures providing for import deposits and purchasing requirements affecting non-fat dry milk and certain animal feed proteins. These measures came into force on 19 March 1976 for imported products and were terminated on 25 October 1976. The Council was informed of the panel composition on 2 March 1977. The Panel Report included a complete examination of the measures and was adopted on 14 March 1978.³⁰

The 1982 Panel Report on “United States - Prohibition of Imports of Tuna and Tuna Products from Canada” examined an embargo imposed by the United States on 31 August 1979. The embargo was lifted effective 4 September 1980, during the Panel’s work. The Report notes as follows:

“... the Panel noted that according to prevailing GATT practice when a bilateral settlement to a dispute had been found, panels had usually confined their reports to a brief description of the case indicating that a solution had been reached.³¹ However, it also noted that in the past, panels had on occasion presented a complete report even if the measure giving rise to the dispute had been disinvoked.³² It furthermore noted that the representative of Canada did not accept that the results obtained bilaterally constituted a satisfactory solution or settlement in terms of paragraph 17 of the Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance, and that he argued that the damage caused by the action which gave rise to the dispute had not been satisfactorily repaired, and that the threat of the United States taking action under Section 205 of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976

continued to exist. He therefore requested the Panel to present a substantial report on the case. The Panel noted that the Canadian Embassy, in a diplomatic note to the Department of State of the United States ... indicated that the arrangements concerning fisheries for albacore tuna off the Pacific coasts of Canada and the United States were without prejudice to action brought before the GATT regarding import prohibition on tuna and tuna products. The Panel also noted that the representative of the United States, although expressing serious doubts about the usefulness of establishing a comprehensive report when a conciliation on the dispute had been achieved, nevertheless declared himself willing and ready to provide his full cooperation if the Panel wanted to establish a comprehensive report. The Panel subsequently felt that in this particular case it had to consider itself what type of report it should present to the Council and decided to proceed with its work and establish a complete report".³³

The 1980 Panel Report on "EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Apples from Chile"³⁴ concerned restrictions imposed by the EEC from April through August 1979. The Panel was established on 25 July 1979 in principle; on 6 November 1979 the Council agreed to terms of reference referring to "restrictions which were applied by the EEC on imports of apples from Chile" and the Council was informed of the Panel members on 29 January 1980.

The 1989 Panel Report on "EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile"³⁵ concerned restrictions imposed by the EEC from April through August 1988. The Panel was established on 4 May 1988 and its first meeting was held in October 1988. (6) Acts of private parties

In 1958 the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided to appoint a group of experts "to study and make recommendations with regard to whether, to what extent if at all, and how the CONTRACTING PARTIES should undertake to deal with restrictive business practices in international trade."³⁶ The 1960 Report of the Group of Experts on "Restrictive Business Practices - Arrangements for Consultations" notes that

"... Members agreed that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should now be regarded as an appropriate and competent body to initiate action in this field.

"... the Group agreed to recommend that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should encourage direct consultations between contracting parties with a view to the elimination of the harmful effects of particular restrictive practices".³⁷

The Group was divided on the nature of further measures to be recommended and on the applicability of Article XXIII.

"The majority felt that, as experts on restrictive business practices rather than on the legal aspects of GATT, the Group were not competent to judge whether restrictive business practices were a matter that could be deemed to fall under any specific provisions of GATT - for example, whether the provisions of Article XXIII would be applicable. However, the majority were convinced that, regardless of the question whether Article XXIII could legally be applied, they should recommend to the CONTRACTING PARTIES that they take no action under this Article. Such action would involve the grave risk of retaliatory measures under the provisions of paragraph 2 of that Article, which would be taken on the basis of judgments which would have to be made without adequate factual information about the restrictive business practice in question ...”³⁸

“... The minority hold the view that [when consultations fail to lead to voluntary settlements] the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article XXIII are applicable. According to the first part of this paragraph the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall, when matters are referred to them, make appropriate recommendations to the contracting parties concerned. While referring to these provisions, the minority advise against the use by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of the authority conferred upon them under the second part of paragraph 2.”³⁹

The Report of the Group of Experts also notes the disagreement within the Group regarding the minority proposal that where bilateral consultations on eliminating harmful effects of particular restrictive business practices failed to reach a mutually satisfactory conclusion, the dispute be referred to a standing group of five experts appointed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which would examine the matter, consult with the parties and submit a report to the secretariat on the outcome. The majority stated that

“... The complexities of the subject, and the impossibility of obtaining accurate and complete information on private commercial activities in international trade and of enforcing decisions without adequate powers of investigation and control, precluded the possibility of an effective control agreement which was not based upon [adoption by countries of powers to act against international restrictive business practices, or a supra-national body with broad powers of investigation and control]. Therefore, it was at this stage impracticable to set up any procedures for investigating or passing judgment on individual cases within the framework of GATT. ...

“... Even if sufficient information is available in some cases there are no internationally agreed standards or guidelines upon which judgment could be based. No such standards or guidelines are contained either in the Resolution of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which is the basis of the work of the present Group, or in the definition of restrictive practices which is proposed by the minority, since neither provides an answer to the question, in what circumstances specific business practices in international trade should be deemed harmful. In making their judgments, experts would therefore have to rely on their personal views ... The majority did not consider that any useful purpose would be served by the intervention of experts in the consultations, and, moreover, could not agree that in present circumstances governments should be obliged to accept such intervention”.

On 18 November 1960 the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Decision on Arrangements for Consultations on Restrictive Business Practices, which did not include provision for participation by a group of experts and which did not refer to Article XXIII.⁴⁰

In the 1984 Panel Report on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act”, the Panel examined, inter alia, written undertakings submitted by foreign investors to the Canadian government concerning the conduct of the business that an investor was proposing to acquire or establish.

“The panel carefully examined the Canadian view that the purchase undertakings should be considered as private contractual obligations of particular foreign investors vis-à-vis the Canadian government. The Panel recognized that investors might have an economic advantage in assuming purchase undertakings, taking into account the other conditions under which the investment was permitted. The Panel felt, however, that even if this was so, private contractual obligations entered into by investors should not adversely affect the rights which contracting parties, including contracting parties not involved in the dispute, possess under Article III:4 of the General Agreement and which they can exercise on behalf of their exporters. This applies in particular to the rights deriving from the national treatment principle, which - as stated in Article III:1 - is aimed at preventing the use of internal measures ‘so as to afford protection to domestic production’.”⁴¹

During discussion in the Council in 1986 concerning the EEC request for a working party under Article XXII:2 on “Japan - Measures Affecting the World Market for Copper Ores and Concentrates”, the representative of Japan stated that “the difficulties which [the EEC] claimed to have encountered resulted from commercial transactions or from legitimate tariff protection. Neither of these two reasons warranted the invocation of GATT’s dispute settlement mechanism ... The sale prices of refined copper and the purchase prices of copper concentrates were decided on a strictly commercial basis in business negotiations between private, independent parties. Such negotiations, whatever their consequences, were alien to GATT, which was an intergovernmental legal framework”.⁴² The 1988 Good Offices Report of the Personal Representative of the Director-General on the dispute between the EC and Japan concerning certain pricing and trading practices for copper in Japan notes that

“... The EC has maintained that their copper smelting and refining industry has suffered from serious difficulties in obtaining adequate supplies of copper concentrates on acceptable terms. These difficulties were seen as stemming from market distortions resulting from the Japanese smelters often offering higher prices for concentrates than what the EC smelters believe ‘normal market conditions’ justify, thus enabling them to obtain inequitably large shares of concentrates. The EC smelters and refiners have alleged that the high internal price of refined copper in Japan, which made it possible for Japanese smelters to offer such high prices for concentrates, is a result of ‘questionable practices’, including high Japanese tariffs on imports of refined copper, concealed import restrictions, possibly hidden subsidies, and a price cartel operated by the Japanese producers. The Japanese authorities have insisted that the Japanese import duties are consistent with their GATT obligations, that there are no hidden restrictions on imports, that there is no producers’ cartel in Japan, and that the purchasing terms for copper concentrate are a purely commercial matter and so are completely outside the purview of the GATT.

“From the evidence submitted I reach the following conclusions:

“... Japan has not violated any of its GATT obligations. Nor was any evidence presented of the existence of a producers’ cartel in Japan. Although certain kinds of government assistance (research funds, aid for stockpiling, unemployment aids etc.) have been extended in both Japan and the EEC, these do not appear to be of the sorts or amounts that have had any significant impact on the competitive position of the industry in either Japan or the EEC.”⁴³

The Personal Representative also noted that a major element in creating the situation was the Japanese tariff on cathodes and wire bar, and rendered the advisory opinion that the parties resolve the dispute by entering into reciprocal and mutually advantageous negotiations with a view to reduction or elimination of this tariff on an m.f.n. basis, in the context of the Uruguay Round.⁴⁴

In the panel proceeding on “Japan - Trade in Semi-conductors”, “Japan contended that there were no governmental measures limiting the right of Japanese producers and exporters to export semi-conductors at any price they wished ... Exports were limited by private enterprises in their own self-interest and such private action was outside the scope of Article XI:1.”⁴⁵ The Panel found that “... an administrative structure had been created by the Government of Japan which operated to exert maximum possible pressure on the private sector to cease exporting at prices below company-specific costs ... the Panel considered that the complex of measures exhibited the rationale as well as the essential elements of a formal system of export control”.⁴⁶

Therefore, rather than attempt to formulate a precisely worded recommendation designed to cover all contingencies, the Panel feels that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should ask governments to notify all levy/subsidy schemes affecting imports or exports which are dependent for their enforcement on some form of government action”.⁴⁸

(7) Applicability of Article XXIII procedures to requests for rulings

During the Second Session, in discussion of a request by Pakistan for a ruling on the applicability of Article I to rebates of internal taxes in connection with exports, the Chairman stated that the Article XXIII requirements of written representations and consultations did not apply when a delegate was asking only for a ruling on a general point of law and was not submitting the concrete dispute itself.⁴⁹

(1) “any benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly under this Agreement is being nullified or impaired”

The 1962 Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” notes that

“... The Panel thought it essential to have a clear idea as to what would constitute a nullification or impairment. In its view impairment and nullification in the sense of Article XXIII does not arise merely because of the existence of any measures; the nullification or impairment must relate to benefits accruing to the contracting party ‘under the General Agreement’”.⁵⁰

See also the material below at page 730 on the interpretation of the phrase “the relevant GATT provisions” used in terms of reference for panels.

(a) “obligations under this Agreement” and positions taken in trade negotiations

In the panel proceeding on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products” the terms of reference indicated that “in examining the matter, the Panel may take into account all pertinent elements”. The Panel thus considered the Council minutes as well as Japan’s arguments regarding the practices of other countries, the status of the multilateral negotiations and the special characteristics of Japanese agriculture.

“The Panel ... noted that a modification of Article XI:2 has been proposed in the Uruguay Round and that in the Ministerial Declaration of 1986 participants in the Uruguay Round had undertaken the commitment to phase out or bring into conformity all trade restrictive or distorting measures inconsistent with the provisions of the General Agreement or instruments negotiated within the framework of GATT. The Panel noted that it was generally understood that neither this commitment nor the possible modification of provisions of the General Agreement in the course of the negotiations curtailed the rights and obligations of contracting parties under Article XXIII of the General Agreement.

“The Panel recalled that the purpose of GATT panels is to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in taking a decision under Article XXIII:2 and that according to the Ministerial Declaration of 1982, ‘it is understood that decisions [in the dispute settlement process] cannot add or diminish the rights or obligations provided in the General Agreement’. What was pertinent, therefore, in a panel’s conclusions were findings regarding the conformity of the measures with the General Agreement, and their effects on the benefits accruing from the General Agreement. These benefits arose, in part, from the obligations assumed by Japan under the General Agreement. Consequently, the Panel found that Japan's actions could be judged only against its obligations under the General Agreement and not against the practices of others, nor did the Panel consider it appropriate to prejudge the outcome of the negotiations."⁵¹

The 1989 Panel report on "EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile" notes that in this proceeding, Chile argued that the EEC restrictions in question were inconsistent with the standstill commitment in the Punta del Este Declaration.

"The Panel regarded the Standstill Commitment of the Punta del Este Declaration as outside its mandate. The Punta del Este Declaration contained commitments in the context of a plan for continuing negotiations whose outcome was yet to be decided. The Punta del Este Standstill commitments had their own special forum - the Surveillance Body established by the Committee on Trade Negotiations - to which any complaint concerning them should be taken. These commitments could therefore not be considered to be obligations within the meaning of Article XXIII:1(a)."⁵²

(2) "or that the attainment of any objective of the Agreement is being impeded"

Although the text of Article XXIII:1 dates from the 30 October 1947 text of the General Agreement, and was largely identical to Article 89 of the Geneva Draft Charter, Article 89 referred to "Members" of the ITO, benefits under the Charter, and attainment of the objectives in Article 1 of the Charter.

References to "the objectives of this Agreement" appear in Articles XV:7(a), XVI:2, XVI:5, XVIII:1, XXIII:1, XVIII:2, XXV:1, XXVIIIbis:1, XXXVI:1(a), XXXVII:2(b)(iii), and the Notes Ad Articles XXIV:11 and XXXVI:1. The Preamble to the General Agreement also refers to "these objectives". At the 1954-55 Review Session, it was agreed to incorporate the Preamble, with some additions, into the text of the General Agreement as a new Article I in Part I entitled "Objectives". For the text of this proposed Article I, see the material on the Preamble at pages 21-22. However, the instrument which would have effected this amendment was the Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX, which did not enter into force, due to lack of the requisite unanimous approval, and was abandoned; as a result the amended Article I did not go into effect.⁵³

The 1979 Panel Report on "European Communities - Refunds on Exports of Sugar" dealt, inter alia, with the claim by Australia that the EC system of sugar export subsidies "had impeded the attainment of the objectives of the General Agreement."⁵⁴ The Panel did not consider this question since "no detailed submission had been made as to exactly ... which objective of the General Agreement had been impeded."⁵⁵

In a complaint against Japan in 1983, the European Community, basing its request on Article XXIII:1(c), requested establishment of a working party under Article XXIII:2, on the basis that "benefits of successive GATT negotiations with Japan have not been realized owing to a series of factors peculiar to the Japanese economy which have resulted in a lower level of imports, especially of manufactured products, as compared with other industrial countries. ... The European Community is of the view that the present situation constitutes a nullification or impairment by Japan, of the benefits otherwise accruing to the European Community under the GATT, and an impediment to the attainment of GATT's objectives. In particular the general GATT objective of 'reciprocal and mutually advantageous arrangements' has not been achieved."⁵⁶ In discussion of this complaint in the Council, one delegation commented that "the EEC had not based its case on particular provisions of the General Agreement but instead referred to one of its objectives. This was unprecedented ... problems and precedents could arise if such loose terms for a working party were accepted. He therefore urged extreme caution, and reiterated that while not opposing the setting up of a working party he would first like to know from the EEC what specific measures and policies it was asking to be examined".⁵⁷ The complaint was ultimately not pursued.

In a complaint concerning "EEC - Operation of Beef and Veal Régime" in 1984, Australia claimed that "the operation of the Community's beef and veal régime had nullified and impaired Australia's benefits under the General Agreement and had also impeded the attainment of the objectives of the GATT as envisaged in Article XXIII:1(b)".⁵⁸ The complaint was not pursued.

(3) Paragraph 1(a): "as the result of the failure of another contracting party to carry out its obligations under this Agreement"

(a) Prima facie nullification or impairment

The 1962 Panel Report on "Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII" notes that

"... In cases where there is a clear infringement of the provisions of the General Agreement, or in other words, where measures are applied in conflict with the provisions of GATT and are not permitted under the terms of the relevant protocol under which the GATT is applied by the contracting party, the action would, prima facie, constitute a case of nullification or impairment and would ipso facto require consideration of whether the circumstances are serious enough to justify the authorization of suspension of concessions or obligations".⁵⁹

This statement concerning "prima facie nullification or impairment", or the following statement from the 1979 Understanding, has been referred to in many subsequent panel reports as established GATT practice.⁶⁰ The Agreed Description of the Customary Practice of the GATT in the Field of Dispute Settlement annexed to the 1979 Understanding provides as follows:

"In practice, contracting parties have had recourse to Article XXIII only when in their view a benefit accruing to them under the General Agreement was being nullified or impaired. In cases where there is an infringement of the obligations assumed under the General Agreement, the action is considered prima facie to constitute a case of nullification or impairment. A prima facie case of nullification or impairment would ipso facto require consideration of whether the circumstances are serious enough to justify the authorization of suspension of concessions or obligations, if the contracting party bringing the complaint so requests. This means that there is normally a presumption that a breach of the rules has an adverse impact on other contracting parties, and in such cases, it is up to the contracting parties against whom the complaint has been brought to rebut the charge".⁶¹

(b) Relevance of trade effects

The 1984 "Panel on Japanese Measures on Imports of Leather" found that restrictions on imports of leather constituted a prima facie case of nullification or impairment:

"The Panel noted that its terms of reference explicitly required it 'to make findings on the question of nullification or impairment'. It noted that since a prima facie case had been established, according to established GATT practice it was up to Japan to rebut the presumption that nullification or impairment had actually occurred.

⁶¹26S/216, para.5.

“Against this background the Panel considered Japan’s argument that the existence of the quotas themselves did not necessarily mean that nullification or impairment of benefits accruing to the United States had actually been caused, but that this depended solely upon whether or not the allocation system and its implementation functioned so as to hinder United States’ trade. ...

“... the Panel could not escape the conclusion that the import restrictions were maintained in order to restrict imports ...

“In any event, the Panel wished to stress that the existence of a quantitative restriction should be presumed to cause nullification or impairment not only because of any effect it had had on the volume of trade but also for other reasons e.g., it would lead to increased transaction costs and would create uncertainties which could affect investment plans.

“The Panel therefore found that the arguments advanced by Japan were not sufficient to rebut the presumption that the quantitative restrictions on imports of leather had nullified or impaired benefits accruing to the United States under Article XI of the General Agreement”.⁶²

The 1987 Panel Report on “United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances” examined (inter alia) an excise tax levied on imported petroleum at a higher rate than on the like domestic product, which the Panel found was inconsistent with US obligations under Article III:2, first sentence. The major contention of the United States was that the tax differential was so small that its trade effects were minimal or nil and that the tax differential did not nullify or impair benefits accruing to the applicant parties Canada, Mexico and the EEC under the General Agreement. The Panel considered that “The question raised by the case before the Panel is whether the presumption that a measure inconsistent with the General Agreement causes a nullification or impairment of benefits accruing under that Agreement is an absolute or a rebuttable presumption and, if rebuttable, whether a demonstration that a measure inconsistent with Article III:2, first sentence, has no or insignificant effects on trade is a sufficient rebuttal”.⁶³ The Panel Report notes as follows:

“... the practice of the CONTRACTING PARTIES is to make recommendations or rulings on measures found to be inconsistent with the General Agreement independent of the impact of such measures [Citing paragraph 5 of the Annex to the 1979 Understanding:] “Thus, the 1979 Understanding does not refer to the adverse impact of a measure, and the possibility of a rebuttal, in connection with the power of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make recommendations or give rulings on measures inconsistent with the General Agreement; it does so only in connection with the authorization of compensatory action. This, in the view of the Panel, supports the conclusion that the impact of a measure inconsistent with the General Agreement is not relevant for a determination of nullification or impairment by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

“The Panel examined how the CONTRACTING PARTIES have reacted in previous cases to claims that a measure inconsistent with the General Agreement had no adverse impact and therefore did not nullify or impair benefits accruing under the General Agreement to the contracting party that had brought the complaint. The Panel noted such claims had been made in a number of cases but that there was no case in the history of the GATT in which a contracting party had successfully rebutted the presumption that a measure infringing obligations causes nullification and impairment ... ”.⁶⁴

After reviewing some other cases,⁶⁵

“The Panel concluded from its review of the above and other cases that, while the CONTRACTING PARTIES had not explicitly decided whether the presumption that illegal measures cause nullification or impairment could be rebutted, the presumption had in practice operated as an irrefutable presumption”.⁶⁶

(4) Paragraph 1(b): “as the result of the application by another contracting party of any measure, whether or not it conflicts with the provisions of this Agreement”

(a) Definition of “non-violation nullification or impairment”: “reasonable expectations” and “upsetting the competitive relationship”

The first case in which “non-violation nullification or impairment”⁶⁷ was examined in the GATT was the complaint on “Cuban Import Restrictions on Textiles”, where the US delegate stated that “whether or not it is in conflict with the letter of these provisions, there can be no question, in the view of my Government, that this measure is a clear nullification of the benefits which the General Agreement seeks to provide.”⁶⁸ However, the first report containing a finding concerning Article XXIII:1(b) was the 1950 Report of the Working Party on “The Australian Subsidy on Ammonium Sulphate”. The Working Party first found that the measure taken by the Australian government, in withdrawing a wartime subsidy on sodium nitrate fertilizer while maintaining a subsidy on ammonium sulphate fertilizer, was not inconsistent with Australia’s obligations under the General Agreement.

“The working party next considered whether the injury that the Government of Chile said it had suffered represented a nullification or impairment ... It was agreed that such impairment would exist if the action of the Australian Government which resulted in upsetting the competitive relationship between sodium nitrate and ammonium sulphate could not reasonably have been anticipated by the Chilean Government, taking into consideration all pertinent circumstances and the provisions of the General Agreement, at the time it negotiated for the duty-free binding on sodium nitrate. The working party concluded that the Government of Chile had reason to assume, during these negotiations, that the war-time fertilizer subsidy would not be removed from sodium nitrate before it was removed from ammonium sulphate. In reaching this conclusion, the working party was influenced in particular by the combination of the circumstances that:

“(a) The two types of fertilizer were closely related;

“(b) Both had been subsidized and distributed through the same agency and sold at the same price;

“(c) Neither had been subsidized before the war, and the war-time system of subsidization and distribution had been introduced in respect of both at the same time and under the same war powers of the Australian Government;

“(d) This system was still maintained in respect of both fertilizers at the time of the 1947 tariff negotiations.

“For these reasons, the working party also concluded that the Australian action should be considered as relating to a benefit accruing to Chile under the Agreement, and that it was therefore subject to the provisions of Article XXIII. ... The inequality created and the treatment Chile could have expected at the time of the negotiation, after taking into consideration all pertinent circumstances, including the circumstances mentioned above, and the provisions of the General Agreement, were important elements in the working party’s conclusions.

⁶⁶34S/157,158, para.5.1.7.

⁶⁷While the term “non-violation nullification or impairment” does not appear in the negotiating history or early GATT usage, it appears to have been added to the GATT vocabulary through the writings of GATT legal scholars. It is used here to refer to nullification or impairment under Article XXIII:1 in the absence of a “violation”, that is, under Article XXIII:1(b) or (c).

⁶⁸GATT/CP.2/W/13 at p. 1.

“The situation in this case is different from that which would have arisen from the granting of a new subsidy on one of the two competing products. In such a case, given the freedom under the General Agreement of the Australian Government to impose subsidies and to select the products on which a subsidy would be granted, it would be more difficult to say that the Chilean Government had reasonably relied on the continuation of the same treatment for the two products. In the present case, however, the Australian Government, in granting a subsidy on account of the war-time fertilizer shortage and continuing it in the post-war period, had grouped the two fertilizers together and treated them uniformly. In such circumstances it would seem that the Chilean Government could reasonably assume that the subsidy would remain applicable to both fertilizers so long as there remained a local nitrogenous fertilizer shortage.”⁶⁹

The 1952 Panel Report on “Treatment by Germany of Imports of Sardines” which examined a complaint by Norway that the new German tariff schedule treated imports of sprats and herrings differently from sardines, did not find a breach of Articles I or XIII; however,

“The Panel ... agreed that ... impairment [of a benefit under Article XXIII] would exist if the action of the German Government, which resulted in upsetting the competitive relationship between preparations of clupea pilchardus and preparations of the other varieties of the clupeoid family could not reasonably have been anticipated by the Norwegian Government at the time it negotiated for tariff reductions on preparations of clupea sprattus and clupea harengus. The Panel concluded that the Government of Norway had reason to assume, during these negotiations that preparations of the type of clupeae in which they were interested would not be less favourably treated than other preparations of the same family and that this situation would not be modified by unilateral action of the German Government.”⁷⁰

During the 1954-55 Review Session, the Review Working Party on “Other Barriers to Trade” considered a number of proposals for strengthening the provisions of the General Agreement on subsidies, including proposals regarding the negotiability of subsidies and the relationship between subsidies and concessions. The Report of the Working Party notes, inter alia:

“So far as domestic subsidies are concerned, it was agreed that a contracting party which has negotiated a concession under Article II may be assumed, for the purpose of Article XXIII, to have a reasonable expectation, failing evidence to the contrary, that the value of the concession will not be nullified or impaired by the contracting party which granted the concession by the subsequent introduction or increase of a domestic subsidy on the product concerned.”⁷²

The 1961 Report of the Panel on “Subsidies”, citing this paragraph, provides:

“In this connexion it was noted that the expression ‘reasonable expectation’ was qualified by the words ‘failing evidence to the contrary’. By this the Panel understands that the presumption is that unless such pertinent facts were available at the time the tariff concession was negotiated, it was then reasonably to be expected that the concession would not be nullified or impaired by the introduction or increase of a domestic subsidy.”⁷³

In the 1985 Panel Report on “EEC - Production Aids Granted on Canned Peaches, Canned Pears, Canned Fruit Cocktail and Dried Grapes”, which has not been adopted, the Panel found as follows on the basis of the panel reports referred to directly above:

⁷⁰G/26, adopted on 31 October 1952, 1S/53, 58, para. 16.

⁷¹W.9/178, noted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 16 February 1955, 3S/77.

⁷²L/334 and Addendum, adopted on 3 March 1955, 3S/222, 224, para. 13. The 1961 Report of the Panel on “Subsidies” notes that the words “or increase” appear in the English text of the Review Working Party report, but not in the French text; their insertion was approved at the meeting when the report was adopted in 1955: see SR.9/41 p. 5.

⁷³L/1442 & Add.1-2, adopted on 21 November 1961, 10S/201, 209, para. 28.

“The Panel recalled its earlier finding ... that in past GATT practice it had been established that the upsetting of the competitive position of an imported product as a result of a subsequent domestic measure, which could not have reasonably been anticipated by the party bringing the complaint at the time of negotiation of a tariff concession on the imported product, would constitute nullification or impairment of the tariff concessions. ...

“The Panel considered whether the aid systems for each product upset the competitive relationship between EEC products and those imported from the United States. With regard to canned peaches, canned pears, and canned fruit mixtures the Panel concluded that the minimum price granted to growers of fresh peaches and pears did not adversely affect the competitive relationship between EEC and imported canned peaches, pears or fruit cocktail. With regard to the production aids granted on canned peaches, canned pears and canned fruit mixtures the Panel concluded that:

- “since the production aids made up any differences between the prices of Community products and those of products from non-member countries, foreign product could never improve its competitiveness in the EEC;
- “whenever EEC fresh fruit prices and processing costs for peaches and pears were higher than those in non-EEC countries, EEC processors of peaches and pears were compensated for the differences in fresh fruit prices and processing costs. To this extent, the EEC production aids more than merely compensated EEC processors for the costs resulting from the granting of a minimum price to growers. The Panel noted that, since their introduction, the production aids had always exceeded that amount necessary to compensate for any increased costs resulting from the minimum grower prices for fresh fruit;
- “since the production aid is calculated as the difference between the computed EEC price and the duty-free price of imported product, the bound rates of tariff duty had become an absolute margin of protection for EEC products cancelling any cost and price advantages of foreign competitors.

“The Panel concluded, therefore, that the production aids granted to processors upset the competitive relationship between EEC and imported canned peaches, canned pears and canned fruit cocktail.”⁷⁴

The 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins” examined, inter alia, the argument of the United States that EC production subsidies paid since 1966 nullified or impaired the value of duty-free tariff bindings for oilseeds and oilcakes.

“... The Panel examined whether it was reasonable for the United States to expect that the Community would not introduce subsidy schemes systematically counteracting the price effect of the tariff concessions. ... The essential argument of the Community in this respect was that it is not legitimate to expect the absence of production subsidies even after the grant of a tariff concession because Articles III:8(b) and XVI:1 explicitly recognize the right of contracting parties to grant production subsidies. This right would be effectively eliminated if its exercise were assumed to impair tariff concessions.

“The Panel ... found the following: ... At issue in the case before it are product-specific subsidies that protect producers completely from the movement of prices for imports and thereby prevent tariff concessions from having any impact on the competitive relationship between domestic and imported oilseeds. The Panel considered that the main value of a tariff concession is that it provides an assurance of better market access through improved price competition. Contracting parties negotiate tariff concessions primarily to obtain that advantage. They must therefore be assumed to base their tariff negotiations on the expectation that the price effect of the tariff concessions will not be systematically offset. If no right of redress were given to them in such a case they would be reluctant to make tariff concessions and the General Agreement would no longer be useful as a legal framework for incorporating the results of trade negotiations. The Panel does not share the view of the Community that the recognition of the legitimacy of such expectations would amount to a re-writing of the rules of the General Agreement. The contracting parties have decided that a finding of impairment does not authorize them to request the impairing contracting party to remove a measure not inconsistent with the General Agreement; such a finding merely allows the contracting party frustrated in its expectation to request, in accordance with Article XXIII:2, an authorization to suspend the application of concessions or other obligations under the General Agreement. The recognition of the legitimacy of an expectation thus essentially means the recognition of the legitimacy of such a request. The recognition of the legitimacy of an expectation relating to the use of production subsidies therefore in no way prevents a contracting party from using production subsidies consistently with the General Agreement; it merely delineates the scope of the protection of a negotiated balance of concessions. For these reasons the Panel found that the United States may be assumed not to have anticipated the introduction of subsidies which protect Community producers of oilseeds completely from the movement of prices for imports and thereby prevent tariff concessions from having any impact on the competitive relationship between domestic and imported oilseeds, and which have as one consequence that all domestically-produced oilseeds are disposed of in the internal market notwithstanding the availability of imports.”⁷⁵

The 1992 Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on “Follow-up on the Panel Report ‘EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins’” notes in this connection:

“There was ... nothing in the reasoning of the original Panel that indicated that the impairment of tariff concessions through a production subsidy could only take place through a subsidy which completely protected producers from the price movements of imports. Applying this finding to the present situation, the Panel considered that the assurance of better market access through improved price competition would be meaningless if the effect of the general movement of prices on the production level of the product subject to the concession were to be systematically counteracted. The Panel considered that the original Panel’s finding with respect to impairment had not been based on the specific method of delivering production subsidies, but rather on the Community’s systematic denial, through substantially offsetting the effect of the general movement of import prices on the allocation of resources to production, of the benefits reasonably to be expected from the reciprocal exchange of tariff concessions. ...

“... The Panel considered that, in these circumstances, the new system of regionalized, direct, yield-based per hectare payments, effectively offsets the general movement of import prices and renders the level of Community production substantially insensitive to the general movement of world market prices, and thereby continues to impair the benefits the United States could reasonably expect to accrue to it under the tariff concessions in question.

“The Panel noted in this context that under the system of Maximum Guaranteed Areas the level of Community production of oilseeds that had been achieved as a result of the impairment of the tariff concessions would be maintained or at least not discouraged. The Panel also noted that the Community had aligned the support for oilseeds under the new system with the support or returns for producers of alternative crops protected by variable levies which completely insulate Community producers from world market prices; the Panel noted that this alignment as such would appear to be difficult to reconcile with the reasonable expectations of the United States at the time the zero tariff bindings were negotiated.”⁷⁶

(b) Relevance of concessions

All panel reports which have dealt with claims of non-violation nullification or impairment, except for one, have concerned nullification or impairment of tariff concessions. The exception is the 1985 Panel Report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, cited below.

The 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins” discussed the relationship between a non-violation complaint based on ⁷⁵L/6627, adopted on 25 January 1990, 37S/86, 128-129, paras. 147-148.

Article XXIII:1(b) and tariff concessions, and “the purpose of the provisions of Article XXIII relating to the impairment of benefits accruing under the General Agreement”.

“... The Panel noted that these provisions, as conceived by the drafters and applied by the contracting parties, serve mainly to protect the balance of tariff concessions. The idea underlying them is that the improved competitive opportunities that can legitimately be expected from a tariff concession can be frustrated not only by measures proscribed by the General Agreement but also by measures consistent with that Agreement. In order to encourage contracting parties to make tariff concessions they must therefore be given a right of redress when a reciprocal concession is impaired by another contracting party as a result of the application of any measure, whether or not it conflicts with the General Agreement.”⁷⁷

The 1990 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products Applied Under the 1955 Waiver and Under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariffs Concessions” notes that the EEC had claimed that restrictions on imports of sugar-containing products under the 1955 waiver in question nullified or impaired benefits accruing to the EEC under the General Agreement and that the United States therefore owed compensation to the EEC. The Panel found, inter alia:

“According to the 1979 Understanding on dispute settlement, a contracting party bringing a complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) is ‘called upon to provide a detailed justification’ ... The Panel noted that Article XXIII:1(b), as conceived by the drafters and applied by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, serves mainly to protect the balance of tariff concessions ... The party bringing a complaint under that provision would therefore normally be expected to explain in detail that benefits accruing to it under a tariff concession have been nullified or impaired. ...”.⁷⁸

See also the references to tariff concessions in the two Panel Reports on “Treatment by Germany of Imports of Sardines”⁷⁹ and “German Import Duties on Starch and Potato Flour”.⁸⁰

(c) Non-violation nullification or impairment not relating to concessions

The only instance in which a panel has found that a “benefit accruing ... under this Agreement” other than a concession was nullified or impaired under Article XXIII:1(b) is the 1985 Panel Report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, which has not been adopted. In this case, the United States challenged the conformity with Article I:1 of tariff preferences on certain citrus products extended under agreements between the EC and certain Mediterranean countries. The examinations of these agreements conducted under Article XXIV had not resulted in adoption of any conclusions under Article XXIV:7. The US had not made a specific claim of non-violation nullification or impairment in consultations or in its request for a panel, and stated its claim under Article XXIII:1(b) in response to a question by the Panel.⁸¹ The Panel found that, given the undetermined legal status of the preferences with respect to Article XXIV, there could not be said to be a clear case of infringement which would constitute prima facie nullification or impairment under Article XXIII:1(a) (see at page 707 below). It then examined the application of Article XXIII:1(b). The Panel found that

“Given that the tariffs on some of the products covered by the complaint of the United States were not bound, that the preferences were already being granted by the EC to certain Mediterranean countries on certain fresh citrus before the negotiation of concessions by the Community of the Nine in 1973, and that it could be expected that these preferences would be deepened and extended thereafter, prima facie nullification or impairment of benefits accruing under Article II in the sense of Article XXIII:1(b) could not be concluded on the basis of past precedents ...”.⁸²

⁸²*Ibid.*, para. 5.1(f).

However, the Panel then went on as follows:

“... the Panel considered that although complaints brought previously under Article XXIII:1(b) had related to benefits arising from Article II, it believed that this did not signify that Article XXIII:1(b) was limited only to those benefits. The drafting history of Article XXIII confirmed that this Article, including paragraph 1(b) thereof, protected any benefit under the General Agreement ...⁸³ This would include then the benefits accruing to the United States under Article I:1 which applied to bound and unbound tariff items alike ...

“The Panel noted that the basic purpose of Article XXIII:1(b) was to provide for offsetting or compensatory adjustment in situations in which the balance of rights and obligations of the contracting parties had been disturbed.⁸⁴ One of the fundamental benefits accruing to the contracting parties under the General Agreement, therefore, was the right to such adjustment in situations in which the balance of their rights and obligations had been upset to their disadvantage. ...”⁸⁵

The Panel reached the conclusion that “in this particular situation the balance of obligations underlying Articles I and XXIV of the General Agreement had been upset to the disadvantage of the contracting parties not party to these agreements and that the United States was therefore entitled to offsetting or compensatory adjustment to the extent that the grant of the preferences had caused substantial adverse effects to its actual trade or its trade opportunities”.⁸⁶ In Council discussion of this Panel Report the EC representative stated: “Regarding Article XXIII:1(b) non-violation nullification and impairment, this provision had been applied only to cases in which tariff bindings were at stake; it would be a dangerous precedent to extend its application to situations in which no such commitment had been infringed”.⁸⁷

In the 1990 Panel Report referred to directly above on “United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products Applied Under the 1955 Waiver and Under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions”, the Panel found that the tariff on the imports in question was not subject to a concession, noting that

“... The EEC has not claimed that benefits accruing to it under a tariff concession made by the United States in accordance with Article II have been nullified or impaired as a result of measures taken under the Waiver. The main justification for its claim of nullification or impairment that the EEC presented to the Panel was that the restrictions, in spite of the Waiver, have remained inconsistent with the General Agreement. The Panel recognized that Article XXIII:1(b) does not exclude claims of nullification or impairment based on provisions of the General Agreement other than Article II. However, the Panel noted that Article XXIII:1(b) applies whether or not the measure at issue conflicts with the General Agreement and that, therefore, the question of whether a measure inconsistent with Article XI:1 remains inconsistent with the General Agreement even if covered by a waiver cannot, by itself, determine whether it nullifies or impairs benefits accruing under the General Agreement within the meaning of that provision. A complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) must therefore be supported by a justification that goes beyond a mere characterization of the measure at issue as inconsistent with the General Agreement”.⁸⁸

The Panel found that such a justification had not been supplied.

(d) “Reasonable expectations” in relation to measures formally approved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES

During the Review Session of 1954-55, the Review Working Party on Quantitative Restrictions, in the process of redrafting Article XVIII, examined the extent to which claims could be brought under Article XXIII concerning measures under Article XVIII:C with respect to which the concurrence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES had been obtained. After examining the case referred to above regarding ammonium sulphate, the Working Party agreed on the following conclusions:

“... the question was raised whether and to what extent the concurrence by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in a measure proposed under Article XVIII would affect the right of a contracting party to resort to Article XXIII. The Working Party agreed on the following interpretation which would apply to paragraph 21 of Article XVIII, but would not in any way prejudice the interpretation of Article XXIII in other cases; although it is understood that the concurrence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in a measure under paragraphs 16, 19 or 22, or the fact that the CONTRACTING PARTIES, as envisaged in paragraph 15 did not request a contracting party to consult, would not deprive a contracting party affected by the measure in question of its right to lodge a complaint under Article XXIII, the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in assessing the extent of the impairment of benefits, would have to take into consideration all the facts of the case and, in particular, the terms under which the benefit was obtained, including the provisions embodied in Article XVIII. It is therefore recognized that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would not be in a position to allow a contracting party to resort to the withdrawal of concessions or suspension of obligations under paragraph 2 of Article XXIII, unless the effects of the measure concurred in proved to be substantially different from what could reasonably have been foreseen at the time the measure was considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.⁸⁹

(e) Date of relevant concession in relation to the measures at issue

The 1985 Panel Report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, which has not been adopted, examined the application of Article XXIII:1(b) in relation to the EEC’s application of tariff preferences on citrus products from certain Mediterranean countries. See paragraphs 4.27-4.34 of the Panel Report concerning the Panel’s examination of the date of the tariff concessions, the effect of events which were public knowledge as of that date, and the “reasonable expectations” of the United States at the time it negotiated the concessions in question.⁹⁰

The 1985 Panel Report on “EEC - Production Aids Granted on Canned Peaches, Canned Pears, Canned Fruit Cocktail and Dried Grapes”, which has not been adopted, includes the following findings.

“The Panel first considered the question of whether and to what extent the United States could claim ‘any benefit accruing to it directly or indirectly under this Agreement’ (Article XXIII:1) in respect of the tariff concessions invoked ... [The Panel noted that the EEC had not contested] the US submission that the EEC tariff bindings on canned peaches, canned pears, fruit mixtures and dried grapes had been given ‘as part of a balance of concessions’. The Panel also noted that, pursuant to Article I and II of the General Agreement, tariff concessions, and the benefits deriving therefrom, have to be accorded on a most favoured nation basis independent of the existence of initial negotiating rights in respect of the tariff concessions concerned. The Panel found, therefore, that the tariff bindings granted by the EEC in 1974/79 on the four product categories concerned had created for the United States ‘benefits accruing to it directly or indirectly under this Agreement’ in terms of Article XXIII:1 of the General Agreement ...”.⁹¹

“... nullification or impairment of the tariff concessions would exist if the introduction or increase of the EEC production aids could not have been reasonably anticipated by the United States at the time of the negotiations for the tariff concessions on those products and the aid systems had upset the competitive position of imported canned peaches, canned pears, canned fruit cocktail and dried grapes on the EC market.

“The Panel observed ... that the EC production aids for canned peaches had been introduced prior to the conclusion of the Geneva (1979) Tariff Protocol on 30 June 1979. In the Panel’s view, therefore, the United States should have been aware of the existence of this subsidy and have taken due account of it in the negotiation of the tariff concessions for canned peaches in 1978/79. Since peaches are a principal component of canned fruit cocktail, the Panel found that the United States should also have been aware of any possible effects of these production aids on the economic benefit of the tariff concessions for fruit mixtures negotiated in 1978/79. As regards the EC tariff concessions of 1979 for canned pears, the Panel noted that the production aids had been introduced subsequent to the conclusion of the Geneva (1979) Tariff Protocol and that neither party to the dispute had contended that the EEC Regulation No. 1639/79 of 24 July 1979 could have reasonably been foreseen by the United States at the time it negotiated these tariff concessions.”⁹²

The 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins” also discussed the date of the relevant concession.

“The Panel noted that the tariff concessions for oilseeds were originally made in 1962 following negotiations with the United States and other contracting parties in the Dillon Round and under Article XXIV:6 after the Community had established a common external tariff. The United States bases its case on expectations it claims to have had in 1962 when the concessions for oilseeds were first incorporated into the Community Schedule. The Community argues that the United States can base its claim only on expectations it could reasonably have had when the Schedule of Concessions currently in force was negotiated, namely in 1986 when the production subsidies had already been introduced.

“The first issue the Panel examined in this context was therefore whether the benefits accruing to the United States under the tariff concessions on oilseeds presently in force include the protection of expectations that prevailed in 1962 when the tariff concessions on oilseeds were originally incorporated in the Schedule of Concessions of the Community. The Panel, noting that there is no explicit rule nor a precedent to guide it in this matter, considered the issue in the light of the purpose of the provisions of Article XXIII relating to the impairment of benefits accruing under the General Agreement. The Panel noted that these provisions, as conceived by the drafters and applied by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, serve mainly to protect the balance of tariff concessions.”⁹³...

“The Panel concluded from the above that the answer to the question of whether the expectations of 1962 continue to be protected depends on whether the concessions on oilseeds resulting from the subsequent renegotiations under Article XXIV:6 were part of a new balance of concessions or whether the reinstitution of the concessions at the same rate after the successive enlargements of the Community meant that the balance of concessions originally negotiated in 1962 was to be continued. The Panel noted that the result of the initial Article XXIV:6 negotiations of the Community in 1962 was the creation of a Schedule of Concessions for its common external tariff that had replaced the tariffs of the six founding member States. In these negotiations, the trading partners of the Community compared the benefits accruing to them under the previous tariff concessions of the individual member States with the benefits accruing to them under the common external tariff in the whole territory of the Community. The result of the Article XXIV:6 negotiations following the successive enlargements of the Community was not the creation of a new common external tariff but the extension of the existing tariff concessions of the Community to the new member States.”⁹⁴ On the occasion of these negotiations pre-existing concessions of the Community were renegotiated as well but such modifications remained exceptional. Except where such modifications were specifically renegotiated, the partners of the Community could confine themselves to comparing the benefits accruing to them under the previous tariff concessions of the new member States with the benefits accruing to them as a result of the application of the Community's tariff concessions by the new member States. They had no reason to proceed to a global reassessment of the value of all the Community's concessions in the whole of the Community's territory.

“In these circumstances, the partners of the Community in the successive renegotiations under Article XXIV:6 could legitimately assume, in the absence of any indications to the contrary, that the offer to continue a tariff commitment by the Community was an offer not to change the balance of concessions previously attained. The Panel noted that nothing in the material submitted to it indicated that the Community had made it clear to its negotiating partners that the withdrawal and reinstitution of the tariff concessions for oilseeds as part of the withdrawal of the whole of the Community Schedule meant that the Community was seeking a new balance of concessions with respect to these items. There is in particular no evidence that the Community, in the context of these negotiations, offered to compensate its negotiating partners for any impairment of the tariff concessions through production subsidies or that it accepted compensatory tariff withdrawals by its negotiating partners to take into account any such impairment. The balance of concessions negotiated in 1962 in respect of oilseeds was thus not altered in the successive Article XXIV:6 negotiations. The Panel therefore found that the benefits accruing to the United States under the oilseed tariff concessions resulting from the Article XXIV:6 negotiations of 1986/87 include the protection of reasonable expectations the United States had when these concessions were initially negotiated in 1962.”⁹⁵

(f) Relevance of initial negotiating rights with regard to concessions

Concerning the concept of “initial negotiating rights,” see Article XXVIII.

The 1985 Panel Report on “EEC - Production Aids Granted on Canned Peaches, Canned Pears, Canned Fruit Cocktail and Dried Grapes”, which has not been adopted, includes the following findings.

“The Panel ... considered whether there was any legal basis in the General Agreement for limiting the rights of contracting parties to bring a ‘nonviolation complaint’ under Article XXIII to contracting parties having initial negotiating rights. The Panel found no legal justification in either Article XXIII or past GATT practice for limiting the right of contracting parties to challenge under Article XXIII an alleged nullification or impairment of tariff concessions which have to be applied on a most-favoured-nation basis. The Panel noted that neither past Panel proceedings concerning ‘nonviolation complaints’ in respect of tariff concessions ... nor the parties to this dispute had suggested any such limitation of the rights of contracting parties under Article XXIII. The Panel also noted that the United States had in fact claimed to have initial negotiating rights or substantial interests in the tariff concessions invoked.”⁹⁶

(g) Relevance of statistics on trade flows

The 1952 Panel Report on “Treatment by Germany of Imports of Sardines” notes that “the Panel did not feel that an analysis of the recent trade statistics would lead to definite conclusions as regards the existence of any causal relationship between the measures taken by the German Government and the reduction in the volume of Norwegian exports of fish products to Germany. Nor did the Panel feel that it was necessary for a finding of nullification or impairment under Article XXIII first to establish statistical evidence of damage”.⁹⁷

The 1985 Panel Report on “EEC - Production Aids Granted on Canned Peaches, Canned Pears, Canned Fruit Cocktail and Dried Grapes”, which has not been adopted, includes the finding that

“The Panel was of the view that it was not necessary to establish statistical evidence of damage in order to make a finding of nullification and impairment under Article XXIII. It noted that this view had also been adopted in the Panel report on Treatment by Germany of Imports of Sardines Benefits accruing from bound tariff concessions under Article II also encompass future trading opportunities. Consequently, complaints by contracting parties regarding nullification and impairment should be admissible even if there was not yet statistical evidence of trade damage ...”.⁹⁸

In the 1990 Panel Report on “European Economic Community - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins” the Panel noted that

“... one [past Article XXIII:1(b)] case ... specifically rejected the relevance of statistics on trade flows for a finding on nullification and impairment.⁹⁹ It is of course true that, in the tariff negotiations in the framework of GATT, contracting parties seek tariff concessions in the hope of expanding their exports, but the commitments they exchange in such negotiations are commitments on conditions of competition for trade, not on volumes of trade”.¹⁰⁰

(h) Relevance of other agreements

In the panel proceeding on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins” the EEC argued that as between the parties that signed it, the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII created an expectation as to the criteria that would be used to judge a complaint of non-violation nullification or impairment of tariff concessions. The Panel Report adopted in 1990 provides:

“The Panel was established to make findings ‘in the light of the relevant GATT provisions’; it therefore does not have the mandate to propose interpretations of the provisions of the Subsidies Code which the Community invokes to justify its position. However, the following may be noted in this respect. The Subsidies Code states in Article 8:4 that a nullification or impairment may arise through ‘the effects of the subsidy in displacing or impeding imports of like products into the market of the subsidizing country’. The Community takes the position that its production subsidies for oilseeds were followed by a rise in imports of oilseeds; they therefore neither displaced nor impeded imports and consequently did not cause nullification or impairment. The Community’s position implies that Article 8:4 redefines the benefit accruing under a tariff concession as being no longer the protection of expectations on conditions of competition but the protection of expectations on the level of trade volumes even though the CONTRACTING PARTIES have consistently decided otherwise. It is to be recalled that the CONTRACTING PARTIES considered in 1960 that ‘it is fair to assume that a subsidy which provides an incentive to increased production will, in the absence of offsetting measures, e.g., a consumption subsidy, either increase exports or reduce imports’.¹⁰² The implication of the Community’s position is that, under the Subsidies Code, this assumption could no longer be made. The Panel noted that the purpose of the Subsidies Code is, according to its preamble, ‘to apply fully and interpret’ provisions of the General Agreement. In the view of the Panel this speaks in favour of interpreting Article 8:4 in conformity with the decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES rather than, as the Community suggests, revising these decisions in the light of a particular interpretation of a Code accepted by a portion of the contracting parties”.¹⁰³

(i) Procedural requirements

The 1962 Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” notes:

“While it is not precluded that a prima facie case of nullification or impairment could arise even if there is no infringement of GATT provisions, it would be in such cases incumbent on the country invoking Article XXIII to demonstrate the grounds and reasons for its invocation. Detailed submissions on the part of that contracting party on these points were therefore essential for a judgement to be made under this Article”.¹⁰⁴

Paragraph 5 of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides that "... If a contracting party bringing an Article XXIII case claims that measures which do not conflict with the provisions of the General Agreement have nullified or impaired benefits accruing to it under the General Agreement, it would be called upon to provide a detailed justification".

The 1988 Panel Report on "Japan - Trade in Semi-Conductors" referred to this paragraph in examining a subsidiary claim of non-violation nullification and impairment:

"The Panel had not found that the measures relating to the access to the Japanese market were inconsistent with the provisions of the General Agreement ... The Panel considered that the evidence submitted by the EEC relating to access to the Japanese market did not permit it to identify any measure by the Japanese Government that put EEC exporters of semi-conductors at a competitive disadvantage vis-à-vis those of the United States and that might therefore nullify or impair benefits accruing to the EEC under the General Agreement and impede the attainment of objectives of the General Agreement within the meaning of Article XXIII".¹⁰⁵

The 1990 Panel Report on "United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products Applied Under the 1955 Waiver and Under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions" notes that the EEC had claimed that restrictions on imports of sugar-containing products were inconsistent with Article XI even whether or not they met the terms of the waiver in question, that this waiver simply suspended the obligation to implement provisions of the General Agreement, that these restrictions nullified or impaired benefits accruing to the EEC under the General Agreement, and that the EEC was entitled to compensation from the US pending the withdrawal of these restrictions.

"... The Panel ... concluded that the fact that the restrictions found to be inconsistent with Article XI:1 conform to the terms of the Waiver does not prevent the EEC from bringing a complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) of the General Agreement but it is up to the EEC to demonstrate that a nullification or impairment of benefits accruing to it under the General Agreement has resulted from these restrictions.

"According to the 1979 Understanding on dispute settlement, a contracting party bringing a complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) is 'called upon to provide a detailed justification'... The Panel noted that Article XXIII:1(b), as conceived by the drafters and applied by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, serves mainly to protect the balance of tariff concessions ... The party bringing a complaint under that provision would therefore normally be expected to explain in detail that benefits accruing to it under a tariff concession have been nullified or impaired. ... the Panel noted that Article XXIII:1(b) applies whether or not the measure at issue conflicts with the General Agreement and that, therefore, the question of whether a measure inconsistent with Article XI:1 remains inconsistent with the General Agreement even if covered by a waiver cannot, by itself, determine whether it nullifies or impairs benefits accruing under the General Agreement within the meaning of that provision. A complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) must therefore be supported by a justification that goes beyond a mere characterization of the measure at issue as inconsistent with the General Agreement

"For the reasons indicated in the preceding paragraphs, the Panel did not examine the case before it in the light of Article XXIII:1(b). The Panel would however like to stress that nothing in this report is meant to preclude the EEC from bringing a complaint under that provision with the required detailed justification."¹⁰⁶

(j) Procedural relationship between findings of "violation" and findings regarding "non-violation nullification or impairment"

Although in a number of cases the submissions of applicant parties to panels have included arguments in the alternative concerning both violation of the provisions of the General Agreement and non-violation nullification or impairment, panels which have made a finding that a prima facie case of nullification or impairment exists under Article XXIII:1(a) have generally declined to make a ruling on non-violation nullification or impairment under Article XXIII:1(b). The 1990 Panel on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins”, which found the measures examined were inconsistent with Article III:4, provides in this respect:

“... The Panel ... examined whether its finding that the payments to the processors are inconsistent with the General Agreement might make an examination of the question of the nullification or impairment of the tariff concessions unnecessary. The Panel noted that this would be the case if compliance by the Community with the finding on Article III:4 would necessarily remove the basis of the United States claim of nullification or impairment. The Panel noted that the subsidies the Community presently grants to producers of oilseeds result from the maintenance of producer prices at levels generally exceeding the price of competing imports through payments to processors conditional upon the purchase or transformation of domestic oilseeds. The finding of the Panel under Article III:4 does not relate to the benefits accruing to the Community producers under the Community subsidy schemes but only to the benefits accruing to processors. The Panel further noted that the Community could comply with the Panel’s finding on Article III and still make available in the Community market oilseeds produced with the benefit of producer prices maintained at levels exceeding the price of competing imports. Compliance with the finding on Article III thus could, but would not necessarily, eliminate the basis of the United States complaint that the benefits accruing to the Community producers of oilseeds impair the Community’s tariff concessions for oilseeds. The Panel therefore decided that it had to examine that complaint as well”.¹⁰⁷

(5) Paragraph 1(c): “as the result of the existence of any other situation”

(a) Situations involving macroeconomic or employment factors

During the negotiation of the General Agreement in the Tariff Agreement Committee at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, in discussion of whether to include in the General Agreement the second chapter of the Charter on “Employment and Economic Activity”, it was stated that “if a situation should arise in which considerations came up under Chapter [II of the Charter] which were not dealt with under the exceptions already provided for in Articles [XI through XV] a party could invoke” the Agreement “specifically under Article [XXIII]”. Reference was also made to chapter III on “Economic Development and Reconstruction” in the course of the discussion.¹⁰⁸

It was also stated in discussions at Geneva of Article 89 of the Geneva Draft Charter (corresponding to Article XXIII:1) that it gave a country a right “to seek a modification of the undertakings it has given if, by the action of others, conditions are created in which it can no longer carry out those undertakings. In other words, if there is a world-wide collapse of demand; if a shortage of a particular currency places us all in balance-of-payment difficulties; if we become subject again to wide-spread fluctuations in the prices of primary products with devastating effects upon individual economies ...”.¹⁰⁹ Describing these discussions, the delegate of Australia later stated that at the Preparatory Committee, Australia “had proposed very positive obligations regarding employment. However, [Australia] had been persuaded to accept obligations relating to employment of a less positive character in return for provisions in Article 89 which would enable a Member to obtain without difficulty a review of its obligations under the Charter should the obligations regarding employment not serve to prevent such situations as the collapse of levels of employment and effective demand leading to worldwide depression”.¹¹⁰

Referring to Article 93 of the Havana Charter (corresponding to Article XXIII:1), a Havana Sub-Committee stated: “The Committee was of the opinion that, in case of widespread unemployment or a serious decline in demand in the territory of another Member, a Member might properly have recourse to Article 93, if the measures adopted by the other Member under the provisions of Article 3 [of the Charter, on employment] had not produced the effects which they were designed to achieve and thus did not result in such benefits as might reasonably be anticipated”.¹¹¹

During the Review Session of 1954-55 the Review Working Party on Quantitative Restrictions considered proposals to authorize joint action to prevent disequilibrium in world trade and payments from occurring through macroeconomic pressures, or to meet a situation of general scarcity of a particular currency resulting from an important country running a persistent payments surplus. It was agreed that adequate provision already existed in various provisions of the General Agreement.

“For example, if any contracting party considered that the pressure on its international reserves was resulting from the situation in some individual country, it could raise the question under Article XXIII with a view either to consultations directly with such other contracting parties as it might consider to be particularly concerned, or to reference to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in order to obtain recommendations from them or, if need be, release from specific obligations in accordance with the terms of that Article.”¹¹²

Also during the Review Session, the Review Working Party on “Organizational and Functional Questions” considered a proposal to include in the General Agreement an article on full employment, including provision for initiating consultations in urgent cases to prevent the international spread of a decline in employment, production or demand.

“After discussion it was the opinion of the Working Party that, in view of the present provisions of the Agreement and of changes contained in amendments agreed upon during the Review Session, it was not necessary to include this new Article and that in fact its inclusion might cause some confusion in the application of other Articles of the Agreement. ...

“It was thought that the kind of action [proposed] was already provided for in existing or proposed new Articles of the Agreement. It was clear, for example, that Article XXIII contemplates that any country which considers that a situation had arisen which impeded the attainment of any objective of the Agreement, including, of course, all those enumerated in the new Article I, may refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which then would be obliged promptly to investigate the matter and to make appropriate recommendations. It was also clear that in such a case the CONTRACTING PARTIES would be free to enter into consultations with other interested international bodies which would be in a position to make a contribution to the problem presented.”¹¹³

This Report also repeated the point included in the report on “Quantitative Restrictions” concerning resort to Article XXIII in the event of pressure on a country’s reserves from deflationary influences abroad.¹¹⁴

(b) Situations involving other factors

In 1951, Haiti placed on the Sixth Session agenda an application under Article XXIII:1(c) regarding the withdrawal by the United States under Article XXVII of concessions on straw and sisal matting, which had been initially negotiated with China. The application was withdrawn in the light of agreement to consult on the items concerned.¹¹⁵

The February 1953 “Report on the Accession of Japan” by the Ad Hoc Committee on Agenda and Intersessional Business expressed the view that “violent disruption of trading conditions ... if remedial action consistent with the General Agreement would lead to a general raising of tariff levels and other barriers to world trade, would create a situation impeding the attainment of objectives of the Agreement. This would therefore be a situation falling under part (c) of paragraph 1 of Article XXIII. It was considered that, in the event of such a situation arising, contracting parties whose interests were seriously affected would avail themselves of the facilities of Article XXII, but that if consultations under that Article should prove unsuccessful they could thereafter refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES under paragraph 2 of Article XXIII” and the CONTRACTING PARTIES could authorize release from obligations on a discriminatory basis.¹¹⁶ The Report of the Working Party on “Arrangements for Japanese Participation” adopted in November 1953 at the Eighth Session, which drew up the Declaration on Commercial Relations between Certain Contracting Parties and Japan,¹¹⁷ noted that “most of the representatives of countries intending to accept the Declaration do not regard the approval of an interpretation of Article XXIII on the lines of that contained in the Report of the Ad Hoc Committee as necessary or desirable.” Other delegations disagreed.¹¹⁸

The statement made by Uruguay at the Nineteenth Session in November 1961 concerning the Uruguayan recourse to Article XXIII noted the view of Uruguay that “our case meets not just one, but all the requirements of Article XXIII:1, since it concerns not only the non-fulfilment of obligations, but also the application of other measures, which, taken together, constitute a state of affairs so generalized that it may well fall within the concept provided for in section (c) of that paragraph”.¹¹⁹

In June 1968, the government of France gave notice that it had instituted temporary import ceilings on certain products including automobiles, and had instituted subsidies for production and exports of products of France, in the wake of the events of spring 1968.¹²⁰ In Council discussion of these trade measures on 4 July 1968, the representative of France stated that “The French Government did not ... consider that it was necessary to invoke Articles XII and XIX of the General Agreement to justify the measures it was taking. Article XXIII of the General Agreement recognized that situations might arise that might be such as to impair the benefits that each contracting party was entitled to expect from its participation in the Agreement, and it authorized the protection of those benefits. The French Government was of the opinion that, taking into account the exceptional characteristics of the crisis with which it was faced, the benefits that it was entitled to expect from its participation in the General Agreement would have been seriously impaired unless it had taken interim protective measures”. The representative of the UK stated that “... a dangerous precedent could be set in the GATT if [this argument] were accepted outright. If the French action could not be fitted into any of the provisions of the GATT, the first presumption must be that they were in conflict with these provisions”.¹²¹

In 1974, when Article XXIV:6 negotiations between Canada and the European Communities did not produce a mutually satisfactory result, Canada referred the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 1(c) and 2 of Article XXIII and requested that a panel of experts be appointed to investigate whether the new Schedules LXXII and LXXIIbis maintained a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions between Canada and the European Communities, not less favourable to trade than that provided for in Schedules XL, XLbis, XIX, XXII and LXI.¹²² The representative of the European Communities recalled “that the negotiations that had led to this new Schedule covered practically the whole of the customs tariffs in question and a difficult assessment of both a quantitative and qualitative character was therefore called for. The Community could not accept the proposal. The conciliation procedures of the GATT had hitherto mostly been used in cases of violations of the General Agreement; in the present case, a number of factors made this procedure inappropriate. Such an exercise would involve highly sophisticated assessments in complex trade fields where the criteria for reaching judgements were exceedingly imprecise ...”.¹²³ At the following Council meeting, the Chairman “concluded that it was the wish of the Council, with the exception of the European Communities, to establish such a panel and that he should, in due course, discuss the question of the panel in consultation with the parties most concerned”.¹²⁴ The panel was established but was not convened as the two parties reached a bilateral agreement in March 1975.¹²⁵

In a complaint against Japan in 1983, the European Community requested establishment of a working party under Article XXIII:2, on the basis that “benefits of successive GATT negotiations with Japan have not been realized owing to a series of factors peculiar to the Japanese economy which have resulted in a lower level of imports, especially of manufactured products, as compared with other industrial countries. ... The European Community is of the view that the present situation constitutes a nullification or impairment by Japan, of the benefits otherwise accruing to the European Community under the GATT, and an impediment to the attainment of GATT's objectives. In particular the general GATT objective of 'reciprocal and mutually advantageous arrangements' has not been achieved".¹²⁶ The complaint was ultimately not pursued.

(6) “any contracting party ... may, with a view to the satisfactory adjustment of the matter, make written representations or proposals to the other contracting party or parties which it considers to be concerned”

(a) Notification of consultation requests; requirements concerning requests

Paragraph C.3 of the 1989 Improvements provides: “Requests for consultations under Article ... XXIII:1 shall be notified to the Council by the party which requests consultations. Any request for consultations shall be submitted in writing and shall give the reasons for the request”.

Since entry into effect of the 1989 Improvements, all consultation requests notified in writing have been circulated in the DS/ series with a separate number assigned to each dispute. However, in a few instances requests for consultations have been announced in the Council, and are referred to in the Council minutes.¹²⁷

(b) Consultation requests by more than one contracting party

In a “Joint Representation under Article XXIII:1” submitted in 1982, ten contracting parties requested joint consultations with the Member States of the European Communities on the European Communities’ sugar régime and pointed out “that, although a joint request for Article XXIII consultations may be unusual, it is nevertheless perfectly legal under the GATT”.¹²⁸ The European Communities replied, inter alia, that “according to the practices followed under the General Agreement, a consultation under Article XXIII is of a bilateral character” and that “the Community is prepared forthwith to enter into a set of ten bilateral consultations which would be held jointly. The Community underlines that the fact of acceding to your request on this basis in no way implies that it would be disposed to accept joint action at any later stage under paragraph 2 of the same Article”.¹²⁹

At the October 1993 Council meeting it was announced that consultations had been held under Article XXIII:1 by the United States jointly with Brazil, Argentina, Canada, Chile, Colombia, El Salvador, Guatemala, Thailand, Venezuela and Zimbabwe, concerning US legislation on the use of imported tobacco.¹³⁰

See also the material below at page 728 on procedures in disputes where there are more than one applicant contracting party.

(7) “Any contracting party thus approached shall give sympathetic consideration”

Paragraph C.1 of the 1989 Improvements provides: “If a request is made under Article ... XXIII:1, the contracting party to which the request is made shall, unless otherwise mutually agreed, reply to the request within ten days after its receipt and shall enter into consultations in good faith within a period of no more than thirty days from the date of the request, with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory solution”. Paragraph C.4 provides: “In cases of urgency, including those which concern perishable goods en route, parties shall enter into consultations within a period of no more than ten days from the date of the request ... ”.

(1) “If no satisfactory adjustment is effected”

(a) Prerequisite of consultations

The 1962 Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” notes that “Paragraph 2 of Article XXIII provides that the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall promptly investigate any matter referred to them under that paragraph. From the context it is obvious, however, that before a ‘matter’ can be so referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES it must have been the subject of representations or proposals made pursuant to paragraph 1 of the Article which have not resulted in a ‘satisfactory adjustment’ (unless the difficulty is of the type referred to in paragraph 1(c) of the Article).”¹³¹ The Report of the same Panel on its work when it was reconvened in 1964 notes that the Panel “had been constituted ‘to examine cases referred to it by Uruguay, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article XXIII’ and that the procedures of Article XXIII:2 were, in general, not to be resorted to until possibilities of effecting ‘satisfactory adjustment’ through direct consultation (under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1) had been exhausted Hence, a contracting party could not be obliged to appear before the Panel unless and until the CONTRACTING PARTIES had referred the case to it on the advice of the contracting party invoking the provisions that no ‘satisfactory solution’ had been effected through direct representation or consultation.”¹³²

Paragraph 6 of the 1979 Understanding provides that “Contracting parties should attempt to obtain satisfactory adjustment of the matter in accordance with the provisions of Article XXIII:1 before resorting to Article XXIII:2”.

In a communication dated 11 July 1985, Nicaragua requested the United States to hold bilateral consultations under Article XXII:1 concerning the United States’ prohibition imposed 7 May 1985 on all trade with Nicaragua. The United States did not agree to those consultations, stating that the measures could not be isolated from the broader security situation and that bilateral consultations would be useless. At the July 1985 Council meeting, Nicaragua then requested a panel, supported by a number of delegations. The United States opposed the establishment of a panel stating that there was no function for a panel to perform in this case and that “a panel had no power to address the validity of, or motivation for, invocation of Article XXI:(b)(iii).”¹³³ At the following Council meeting, the Chairman reported that the United States would not oppose establishment of a panel provided that it was understood that the Panel could not examine or judge the validity of or motivation for the invocation of Article XXI:(b)(iii) by the United States in this matter. The Council agreed to establish a panel with terms of reference reflecting that understanding.¹³⁴

In July 1988, New Zealand requested the establishment of a panel on Korean restrictions on imports of beef, stating that Korea had not responded to a request for consultations under Article XXIII:1 made three months earlier and the issue could not wait until the next Council meeting in September as the Council had established panels to consider the complaints of the United States and Australia concerning the same measures and New Zealand sought the establishment of a panel to ensure equitable treatment relative to them. The representative of New Zealand, supported by a number of other delegations, “reiterated that a careful reading of Article XXIII:2 made it clear that consultations under Article XXIII:1 were not a necessary prerequisite for the establishment of a panel ... The only test was that the CONTRACTING PARTIES collectively agree that no satisfactory adjustment had been effected between the parties concerned within a reasonable time.”¹³⁵ However, action on New Zealand’s request was deferred and the panel was established at the September Council meeting; its members were the same as the Panels in the US and Australian complaints (see below at page 728).

¹³¹L/1923, adopted on 16 November 1962, 11S/95, 98, para. 10. A footnote to this passage provides: “However, at least in respect of quantitative import restrictions applied inconsistently with the General Agreement, it has been agreed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES that the holding of a consultation under paragraph 1 of Article XXII would fulfil the conditions of paragraph 1 of Article XXIII (see BISD, Ninth Supplement, pages 19-20).”

At the February 1989 Council meeting, the EC asked the Council to establish a panel under Article XXIII:2 concerning a US Presidential Proclamation of 24 December 1987 providing for increased rates of duty on certain EC products in response to an EC directive on hormones. In response to US objections that this would be procedurally premature, the EC representative stated that “there was no requirement in the General Agreement that formal consultations under Articles XXII or XXIII must be held prior to the establishment of a panel; Paragraph 6 of the 1979 Understanding said only that ‘contracting parties should attempt to obtain a satisfactory adjustment of a matter in accordance with the provisions of Article XXIII:1 before moving to Article XXIII:2’ or requesting a Council ruling or recommendation”.¹³⁶ Article XXIII:1 consultations were held at a later date.

Paragraph C.1 of the 1989 Improvements provides that “... If the contracting party does not respond within ten days, or does not enter into consultations within a period of no more than thirty days, or a period otherwise mutually agreed, from the date of the request, then the contracting party that requested the holding of consultations may proceed directly to request the establishment of a panel or a working party”.

On 23 December 1991, Yugoslavia requested consultations with the European Community under Article XXIII:1 concerning EEC trade measures taken for non-economic reasons against Yugoslavia.¹³⁷ In a communication dated 6 February 1992, Yugoslavia requested the establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2 and paragraphs C.1 and F(a) of the 1989 Improvements, stating that the EC had not replied to the request and had not entered into consultations with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory solution.¹³⁸ A panel was established at the March 1992 Council meeting.¹³⁹

See also the material on “Establishment of working parties and panels” starting at page 721, and on “Matters not raised in consultations, panel request and/or terms of reference” starting at page 734.

(b) Failure to reach a satisfactory adjustment

In Council discussion of recourse to Article XXIII:2 by the EEC concerning “Japan - Customs Duties, Taxes and Labelling Practices on Imported Wines and Alcoholic Beverages” the representative of Japan stated that consultations under Article XXII:1 had not been exhausted and it was premature to proceed to Article XXIII:2. In response to a request by the representative of the European Communities for the Secretariat’s opinion on Japan’s statement that the two parties to a dispute should agree that the conditions of Article XXIII:1 had been fulfilled before moving to application of Article XXIII:2, the Legal Adviser to the Director-General “said that in his view it was not necessary that both parties so agree before moving to set up a panel under Article XXIII:2; such a condition would mean that one party could indefinitely block the procedures simply by saying that bilateral consultations had not yet been terminated”.¹⁴⁰

Paragraph C.2 of the 1989 Improvements provides in this regard: “If the consultations under Article XXII:1 or XXIII:1 fail to settle a dispute within sixty days after the request for consultations, the complaining party may request the establishment of a panel or a working party under Article XXIII:2. The complaining party may request a panel or a working party during the sixty-day period if the parties jointly consider that consultations have failed to settle the dispute”. Paragraph C.4 provides: “In cases of urgency, including those which concern perishable goods en route ... If the consultations have failed to settle the dispute within a period of thirty days after the request, the complaining party may request the establishment of a panel or a working party”.

(c) Recourse to Article XXIII:2 on the basis of consultations under Article XXII:1 or Article XXXVII

As noted in Section III below, the Charter provisions corresponding to Article XXII (on consultations in respect of commercial policy measures) were located in the commercial policy chapter, Chapter IV, and the nullification and impairment provisions corresponding to Article XXIII applied to the entire Charter and were located in Chapter VIII. The Havana Reports record the following notification to other Committees of the Havana Conference by the Sixth Committee, which considered Chapter VIII:

¹⁴⁰C/M/205, p. 10.

"The Sixth Committee has discussed the question of the relationship between Chapter VIII and other parts of the Charter. In the light of its discussion the Committee wishes to make known to other Committees of the Conference ... the view of the Committee that if consultation or investigation has taken place under the provisions of another article, the Organization may regard such consultation or investigation as fulfilling, either in whole or in part, any similar procedural requirement in Chapter VIII."¹⁴¹

The practice of proceeding from consultations under Article XXII:1 to the establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2 was an established one as of the 1950s. For instance, the Panel on "French Assistance to Exports of Wheat and Wheat Flour" was established by the Intersessional Committee at its April-May 1958 meeting after consultations under Article XXII:1 between the parties to the dispute, Australia and France.¹⁴² Other examples of disputes where Article XXIII:2 proceedings were preceded by consultations under Article XXII:1 include the 1962 "Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII"¹⁴³, the dispute brought by the United States in 1982 on "Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act"¹⁴⁴, the dispute brought by the EC in 1987 on "Japan - Trade in Semi-conductors"¹⁴⁵, and the complaint brought by Australia in 1988 on "United States - Restrictions on Imports of Sugar".¹⁴⁶

The procedures agreed in 1960 for consultations on residual import restrictions provide in paragraph 9 that "If consultations held under paragraph 1 of Article XXII do not lead to a satisfactory solution, any of the parties to the consultations may request that consultations be carried out by the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 2 of Article XXII. Alternatively, a country whose interests are affected may resort to paragraph 2 of Article XXIII, it being understood that a consultation held under paragraph 1 of Article XXII would be considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as fulfilling the conditions of paragraph 1 of Article XXIII".¹⁴⁷

Paragraph 11 of the 1966 Procedures provides: "If consultations held under paragraph 2 of Article XXXVII, relate to restrictions for which there is no authority under any provisions for the General Agreement, any of the parties to the consultations may, in the absence of a satisfactory solution, request that consultations be carried out by the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 2 of Article XXIII and in accordance with the procedures set out in the present decision, it being understood that a consultation held under paragraph 2 of Article XXXVII in respect of such restrictions will be considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as fulfilling the conditions of paragraph 1 of Article XXIII if the parties to the consultations so agree". No consultations have ever been held under Article XXXVII.

(2) "the matter may be referred"

(a) "the matter"

The Report of the Sixth Committee of the Havana Conference, which considered the Charter provisions on nullification or impairment, notes that "The Committee agreed that the word 'matter' as used in Article 93 [XXIII] ... refers to nullification or impairment of a benefit and not to the action, failure, measure or situation referred to in sub-paragraphs 1(a), (b) or (c)".¹⁴⁸

The 1994 Panel Report on "United States - Imposition of Anti-Dumping duties on Imports of Fresh and Chilled Atlantic Salmon from Norway" refers to the dispute settlement procedure under the Agreement on Implementation of Article VI as "a three-step process of settlement of a dispute between Parties concerning a single ‘matter’ and the individual claims of which a matter is composed, in which panel examination of a matter would be preceded by consultations concerning that same matter and conciliation concerning that same matter”.¹⁴⁹

One “matter” does not include counter-complaints in regard to distinct matters. Paragraph 9 of the 1979 Understanding provides as follows: “It is ... understood that complaints and counter-complaints in regard to distinct matters should not be linked”.¹⁵⁰

(b) Requests for the establishment of a panel

The 1989 Improvements provide in paragraph F(a) as follows:

“The request for a panel or a working party shall be made in writing. It shall indicate whether consultations were held, and provide a brief summary of the factual and legal basis of the complaint sufficient to present the problem clearly. In case the applicant requests the establishment of a panel or a working party with other than standard terms of reference, the written request shall include the proposed text of special terms of reference. ...”.

(3) “The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall promptly investigate”

See the material in section D (pages 721-763) on panel procedures used to carry out the investigation by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

At the November 1990 Council meeting, the Director-General noted that “the composition of two panels established in 1985 and 1987 was still not decided; these complaints should be either pursued or withdrawn. In the light of such instance, he wondered if a complaint should not be deemed to be withdrawn if it was not actively pursued for, say, more than one year”.¹⁵¹

(4) “the CONTRACTING PARTIES ... shall make appropriate recommendations ... or give a ruling”

The 1962 Panel Report on the “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” notes as follows:

“Paragraph 2 of Article XXIII provides, apart from promptly investigating any matter so referred to them, for two kinds of action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, namely:

“(i) they shall make appropriate recommendations or give a ruling on the matter;

“(ii) they may authorize the suspension of concessions or obligations.

“The action stated under (i) is obligatory and must be taken in all cases where there can be an ‘appropriate’ recommendation or ruling. The action under (ii) is to be taken at the discretion of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in defined circumstances.

“The paragraph states that the CONTRACTING PARTIES ‘shall make appropriate recommendations to the contracting parties which they consider to be concerned or give a ruling on the matter, as appropriate’. Whilst a ‘ruling’ is called for only when there is a point of contention on fact or law, ‘recommendations’ should always be appropriate whenever, in the view of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, they would lead to a satisfactory adjustment of the matter”.¹⁵²

Paragraphs 16 and 17 of the 1979 Understanding provide:

“The function of panels is to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in discharging their responsibilities under Article XXIII:2. Accordingly, a panel should make an objective assessment of the matter before it, including an objective assessment of the facts of the case and the applicability of and conformity with the General Agreement and, if so requested by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, make such other findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making the recommendations or in giving the rulings provided for in Article XXIII:2 ...

“Where the parties have failed to develop a mutually satisfactory solution, the panel should submit its findings in a written form. The report of a panel should normally set out the rationale behind any findings and recommendations that it makes”.

Paragraph 3 of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides: “.... In cases of failure of the parties to reach a mutually satisfactory settlement, panels have normally given assistance to the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making recommendations or in giving rulings as envisaged in Article XXIII:2”. Paragraphs 6(v) and 6(viii) of this Annex also provide:

“Where the parties have failed to develop a mutually satisfactory solution, the panel has submitted its findings in a written form. Panel reports have normally set out findings of fact, the applicability of relevant provisions, and the basic rationale behind any findings and recommendations that it has made”

“In accordance with their terms of reference established by the CONTRACTING PARTIES panels have expressed their views on whether an infringement of certain rules of the General Agreement arises out of the measure examined. Panels have also, if so requested by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, formulated draft recommendations addressed to the parties ...”.

Paragraphs (v) and (viii) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provide:

“(v) The terms of reference of a panel should be formulated so as to permit a clear finding with respect to any contravention of GATT provisions and/or on the question of nullification and impairment of benefits. In terms of paragraph 16 of the Understanding, and after reviewing the facts of the case, the applicability of GATT provisions and the arguments advanced, the panel should come to such a finding. Where a finding establishing a contravention of GATT provisions or nullification or impairment is made, the panel should make such suggestions as appropriate for dealing with the matter as would assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making recommendations to the contracting parties which they consider to be concerned, or give a ruling on the matter, as appropriate.

“(viii) The recommendation or ruling made by the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall be aimed at achieving a satisfactory settlement of the matter in accordance with GATT obligations ...”.

a) Objective of recommendations or rulings

The Report of the Review Session Working Party on “Organizational and Functional Questions” noted that “... any implication ... that the provision of appropriate compensation, on the one hand, and the removal of a measure inconsistent with the Agreement, on the other hand, are fully equivalent and satisfactory alternatives would not accord with the intent and spirit of the Article ... the first objective, if the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided, in the event of a complaint under Article XXIII, that certain measures were inconsistent with provisions of the Agreement, should be to secure the withdrawal of the measures. In such a case, the alternative of providing compensation for damage suffered should be resorted to only if the immediate withdrawal of the measures was impracticable and only as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the measures which were inconsistent with the Agreement".¹⁵³

This view was referred to by the Panel on "French Import Restrictions", in suggesting in its 1962 Report "that the CONTRACTING PARTIES could appropriately recommend to the French Government the withdrawal of restrictions inconsistent with Article XI," and in suggesting "that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend to the United States Government that it refrain, for a reasonable period, from exercising its right, under the procedures of paragraph 2 of Article XXIII, to propose suspension of the application of equivalent obligations or concessions".¹⁵⁴

The 1962 Panel Report on "Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII" provides that

"Where a measure affecting imports is maintained clearly in contradiction with the provisions of the General Agreement (and is not covered by the 'existing legislation' clause of a Protocol), the Panel has in all cases recommended that the measure in question be removed".¹⁵⁵

Paragraph 4 of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides:

"... The aim of the CONTRACTING PARTIES has always been to secure a positive solution to a dispute. A solution mutually acceptable to the parties to a dispute is clearly to be preferred. In the absence of a mutually agreed solution, the first objective of the CONTRACTING PARTIES is usually to secure the withdrawal of the measures concerned if these are found to be inconsistent with the General Agreement. The provision of compensation should be resorted to only if the immediate withdrawal of the measure is impracticable and as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the measures which are inconsistent with the General Agreement. The last resort which Article XXIII provides to the country invoking this procedure is the possibility of suspending the application of concessions or other obligations on a discriminatory basis vis-à-vis the other contracting party, subject to authorization by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of such measures. Such action has only rarely been contemplated and cases taken under Article XXIII:2 have led to such action in only one case".

See also paragraph (ix) of the 1982 Ministerial Declaration.

(b) Recommendations with regard to "violation" complaints under Article XXIII:1(a)

See paragraph 4 of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice, directly above. In most instances where a panel has found that a measure was inconsistent with the General Agreement it has recommended that it be "brought into conformity with the General Agreement".

One panel report adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES has found that a measure was inconsistent with the General Agreement, and at the same time suggested that the CONTRACTING PARTIES grant a waiver. The 1971 Panel Report on "Jamaica - Margins of Preference" held that "... The provision of Article I:4 establishing 10 April 1947 as the base date for permissible margins of preference was ... applicable to Jamaica.

"The Panel agreed, however, that it was important to find a solution which, on the one hand, would not lead to a strained interpretation of the General Agreement and which would leave the General Agreement intact, but which, on the other hand, would take into account the uniqueness of the Jamaican case ...

"The Panel therefore suggests that in the light of the exceptional circumstances the CONTRACTING PARTIES consider taking a decision in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 5 of Article XXV to change with respect to Jamaica the base date referred to in paragraph 4 of Article 1 from 10 August 1947 to 1 August 1962".¹⁵⁶

The Panel drew up a draft waiver decision. The waiver was agreed on 2 March 1971.

In three cases which have been adopted (two under Article XXIII and one under the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII), the recommendations of a panel have included a recommendation of specific actions to be taken. The 1985 Panel Report on "New Zealand - Imports of Electrical Transformers from Finland" found that "the imposition of anti-dumping duties on these imports was not consistent with the provision of Article VI:6(a) of the General Agreement" and concluded that "The Panel proposes to the Council that it addresses to New Zealand a recommendation to revoke the anti-dumping determination and to reimburse the anti-dumping duty paid".¹⁵⁷ The 1991 Panel Report on "United States - Countervailing Duties on Fresh, Chilled and Frozen Pork from Canada" concluded that "the United States countervailing duties on fresh, chilled and frozen pork from Canada are being levied inconsistently with Article VI:3 of the General Agreement because the United States' determination that the production of pork had benefited from subsidies was not made in accordance with the requirements of that provision" and recommended "that the CONTRACTING PARTIES request the United States to either reimburse the countervailing duties corresponding to the amount of the subsidies granted to producers of swine or to make a subsidy determination which meets the requirements of Article VI:3 and reimburse the duties to the extent that they exceed an amount equal to the subsidy so determined to have been granted to the production of pork". The 1993 Panel Report on "United States - Measures Affecting Imports of Softwood Lumber from Canada" discusses this subject as follows:

"... The Panel further noted that panels, having found a measure to be inconsistent with a signatory's obligation, generally recommended that the signatory be requested to bring its measure into conformity with the Agreement. The Panel considered that such a recommendation was especially appropriate in those cases where there were several options available to a signatory to bring itself into conformity with the Agreement. The Panel considered however that such multiple options were not available to the United States in the present case and that the only option open to the United States was, with respect to imports of softwood lumber from Canada, to terminate the bonding requirement, release any bonds, refund any cash deposits and terminate the suspension of liquidation of entries made during the period of application of the inconsistent interim measures imposed in October 1991 under the authority of Section 304 of the Trade Act of 1974.

"Moreover, the Panel noted that the CONTRACTING PARTIES of GATT had adopted two panel reports which had recommended the reimbursement of duties found to have been imposed in a manner inconsistent with GATT obligations, the first involving anti-dumping duties and the second involving countervailing duties. The Panel considered that such a recommendation was also appropriate in this case.

"The Panel therefore recommends to the Committee that it request the United States, with respect to imports of softwood lumber from Canada, to terminate the bonding requirement, release any bonds, refund any cash deposits and terminate the suspension of liquidation of entries made during the period of application of the inconsistent interim measures imposed in October 1991 under the authority of Section 304 of the Trade Act of 1974."¹⁵⁸

The appropriateness of such recommendations has been discussed on a number of occasions in the Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices and the Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures.¹⁵⁹

In some cases where a measure was no longer in effect at the time of the panel report, the panel has found the measure to be inconsistent with the General Agreement and has not recommended that the measure be brought into conformity with the General Agreement; for instance, the 1978 Panel Report on "EEC - Measures on Animal Feed Proteins"¹⁶⁰, the 1980 Panel Report on "EEC Restrictions on Imports of Apples from Chile"¹⁶¹,

The Panel Report under the Agreement on Government Procurement on “Norway - Procurement of Toll Collection Equipment for the City of Trondheim” discusses GATT practice with respect to recommendations in panel reports.

“The Panel ... turned its attention to the recommendations that the United States had requested it to make. In regard to the United States’ request that the Panel recommend that Norway take the necessary measures to bring its practices into compliance with the Agreement with regard to the Trondheim procurement, the Panel noted that all the acts of non-compliance alleged by the United States were acts that had taken place in the past. The only way mentioned during the Panel’s proceedings that Norway could bring the Trondheim procurement into line with its obligations under the Agreement would be by annulling the contract and recommencing the procurement process. The Panel did not consider it appropriate to make such a recommendation. Recommendations of this nature had not been within customary practice in dispute settlement under the GATT system and the drafters of the Agreement on Government Procurement had not made specific provision that such recommendations be within the task assigned to panels under standard terms of reference. Moreover, the Panel considered that in the case under examination such a recommendation might be disproportionate, involving waste of resources and possible damage to the interests of third parties.

“The United States had further requested the Panel to recommend that Norway negotiate a mutually satisfactory solution with the United States that took into account the lost opportunities in the procurement of United States’ companies, including Amtech. Finally, the United States had requested the Panel to recommend that, in the event that the proposed negotiation did not yield a mutually satisfactory result, the Committee be prepared to authorise the United States to withdraw benefits under the Agreement from Norway with respect to opportunities to bid of equal value to the Trondheim contract. Norway had argued that, even if the Panel were to find that the procurement had been conducted inconsistently with the Agreement, such requests should be rejected because they were outside the scope of the complaint referred to the Panel and outside the tasks assigned to dispute settlement panels under the Agreement.

“In examining these requests, the Panel first noted that, as instructed in its terms of reference, it had given Norway and the United States full opportunity to develop a mutually satisfactory solution. The Panel also noted that nothing prevented the two governments from negotiating at any time a mutually satisfactory solution that took into account the lost opportunities of United States’ suppliers, provided such solution was consistent with their obligations under this and other GATT agreements. The issue was whether the Panel should recommend this and further recommend that the Committee be prepared to authorise the withdrawal of benefits under the Agreement from Norway if such a solution were not negotiated.

“The Panel noted that the United States had indicated that it was not asking the Panel to recommend the negotiation of compensation for past losses. However, if this was not the case, it was not evident to the Panel what it was being asked to recommend that Norway negotiate with the United States. Clearly the ‘lost opportunities’ referred to were past opportunities and the remedial action that might be negotiated taking into account these lost opportunities would have to be in the future and therefore in all probability compensatory. The request concerning withdrawal of benefits also confirmed to the Panel that the practical effect of the recommendations sought by the United States would be to invite Norway to offer compensation, in one form or another, to the United States for past losses. Given that the United States had indicated that this was not what it was seeking, the Panel had some difficulty in responding to this request, despite having made efforts to explore its implications with the parties.

¹⁶⁴DS18/R, adopted on 19 June 1992, 39S/128, 154, paras. 7.1-7.2 (noting in para. 7.1 that “The Panel noted that Brazil requested a general ruling on the matter in dispute, but did not request the Panel to make a specific recommendation to the CONTRACTING PARTIES”).

“Moreover, the Panel observed that, under the GATT, it was customary for panels to make findings regarding conformity with the General Agreement and to recommend that any measures found inconsistent with the General Agreement be terminated or brought into conformity from the time that the recommendation was adopted. The provision of compensation had been resorted to only if the immediate withdrawal of the measure was impracticable and as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the measures which were inconsistent with the General Agreement ... Questions relating to compensation or withdrawal of benefits had been dealt with in a stage of the dispute settlement procedure subsequent to the adoption of panel reports.

“The Panel then considered whether there were reasons that would justify dispute settlement panels under the Agreement on Government Procurement differing from the above practice under the General Agreement. In this respect, the Panel noted the argument of the United States that, because benefits accruing under the Agreement were primarily in respect of events (the opportunity to bid), rather than in respect of trade flows, and because government procurement by its very nature left considerable latitude for entities to act inconsistently with obligations under the Agreement in respect of those events even without rules or procedures inconsistent with those required by the Agreement, standard panel recommendations requiring an offending Party to bring its rules and practices into conformity would, in many cases, not by themselves constitute a sufficient remedy and would not provide a sufficient deterrent effect.

“In considering this argument, the Panel was of the view that situations of the type described by the United States were not unique to government procurement. Considerable trade damage could be caused in other areas by an administrative decision without there necessarily being any GATT inconsistent legislation, for example in the areas of discretionary licensing, technical regulations, sanitary and phytosanitary measures and subsidies. Moreover, there had been cases where a temporary measure contested before the GATT had been lifted before a Panel had been able to report.

“The Panel also believed that, in cases concerning a particular past action, a panel finding of non-compliance would be of significance for the successful party: where the interpretation of the Agreement was in dispute, panel findings, once adopted by the Committee, would constitute guidance for future implementation of the Agreement by Parties.

“Moreover, the Panel was not aware of any basis in the Agreement on Government Procurement for panels to adopt with regard to the issues under consideration a practice different from that customary under the General Agreement, at least in the absence of special terms of reference from the Committee.

“In the light of the above, the Panel did not consider that it would be appropriate for it to recommend that Norway negotiate a mutually satisfactory solution with the United States that took into account the lost opportunities of United States companies in the procurement or that, in the event that such a negotiation did not yield a mutually satisfactory result, the Committee be prepared to authorise the United States to withdraw benefits under the Agreement from Norway with respect to opportunities to bid of equal value to the Trondheim contract. The Panel had recognised, however, that nothing prevented the United States from pursuing these matters further in the Committee or from seeking to negotiate with Norway a mutually satisfactory solution provided that it was consistent with the provisions of this and other GATT agreements.”¹⁶⁵

(c) Recommendations with respect to “non-violation” complaints under Article XXIII:1(b)

During discussions on the Charter dispute settlement provisions at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, it was stated that, in case of recommendations affecting otherwise lawful conduct, member states “are under no specific and contractual obligations to accept those Recommendations”.¹⁶⁶

The 1950 Report of the Working Party on “The Australian Subsidy on Ammonium Sulphate” notes as follows:

“In making this recommendation the working party wishes to draw attention to one point of particular importance. There is in their view nothing in Article XXIII which would empower the CONTRACTING PARTIES to require a contracting party to withdraw or reduce a consumption subsidy such as that applied by the Government of Australia to ammonium sulphate, and the recommendation made by the working party should not be taken to imply the contrary. The ultimate power of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXIII is that of authorizing an affected contracting party to suspend the application of appropriate obligations or concessions under the General Agreement. The sole reason why the adjustment of subsidies to remove any competitive inequality between the two products arising from subsidization is recommended is that, in this particular case, it happens that such action appears to afford the best prospect of an adjustment of the matter satisfactory to both parties”.¹⁶⁷

The 1952 Panel Report on “Treatment by Germany of Imports of Sardines”, concerning the treatment of certain imports relative to tariff concessions negotiated by Norway in the Torquay Round, provides that “... the Panel suggests to the CONTRACTING PARTIES that it would be appropriate for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make a recommendation to Germany and Norway in accordance with the first sentence of paragraph 2 of Article XXIII. This recommendation should aim at restoring, as far as practicable, the competitive relationship which existed at the time when the Norwegian Government negotiated at Torquay and which that Government could reasonably expect to be continued”.¹⁶⁸ The Recommendation of 31 October 1952 on the “Complaint by Norway concerning the Treatment by Germany of Imports of preparations of Clupea Sprattus and Clupea Harengus” provides:

“Having Investigated in accordance with Article XXIII the complaint of Norway concerning the treatment by Germany of imports of preparations of Clupea sprattus and Clupea harengus,

“Having Concluded that the evidence produced was not such as to warrant a finding that the measures taken by the German Government regarding the treatment of preparations of Clupea pilchardus were inconsistent with the provisions of Article I paragraph 1 and Article XIII paragraph 1 of the General Agreement, and “Having Found, however, that as a result of these measures the value of the tariff concession obtained by Norway has been impaired,

The CONTRACTING PARTIES

“Recommend that the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany consider ways and means to remove the competitive inequality between the preparations of Clupea pilchardus and those of other varieties of the Clupeoid family which may, in practice, exist as a result of the changes introduced in 1951 and 1952 in the treatment of preparations of Clupea pilchardus as regards the imposition of import duties and taxes and as regards the relaxation of quantitative restrictions on imports, and consult with the Government of Norway with respect to the results of their consideration, and that the two parties report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES not later than the opening day of the Eighth Session”.¹⁶⁹

The report of the reconvened Panel on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” on its examination in 1964 notes in respect of the previous report by the same Panel, adopted on 16 November 1962:

“In dealing with the first group of Uruguayan applications under Article XXIII:2 in 1962, the Panel had been unable to find nullification or impairment under the General Agreement in respect of a large number of items. In many of such cases the contracting party concerned was nevertheless urged to remove the measure in question or any adverse effect which it might have on Uruguayan exports. The Panel was now informed by certain contracting parties that they had been able to take action in this direction".¹⁷⁰

The 1982 Report of the "Panel on Vitamins" concluded that "The Panel considers that the United States has not infringed its commitment under the General Agreement or under the ASP Chemical Products Understanding of 2 March 1979".¹⁷¹ The Panel also concluded that the "European Economic Community ... had in the opinion of the Panel no reason to assume that the tariff treatment of feed-grade quality vitamins would be modified in such a way that imports into the United States would decrease to the extent experienced"¹⁷², and that "the Panel feels that in the light of the particular circumstances, the Council could invite the United States to advance the implementation of the Tokyo Round concession rate on feed-grade Vitamin B12 to such an extent that imported vitamins could again attain their traditional competitive position in the United States market".¹⁷³

The 1989 Panel Report on the complaint of Chile with respect to "EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples" notes a claim of Chile regarding compensation related to non-violation nullification or impairment. Recalling the EEC's tariff concessions on apples, Chile argued that the restrictions in question, even if consistent with the EEC's GATT obligations, distorted the competitive relationship which would otherwise have prevailed between Chilean suppliers and other suppliers on the Community market. Chile argued that compensation was appropriate since of the other possible recommendations - withdrawal of the restrictions or retaliatory withdrawal of concessions - one was meaningless as the measures had lapsed on 31 August 1988 and the other was an undesirable last resort which would not be in Chile's interests. Chile requested that the Panel make a finding of "retroactive prejudice" calculated on the basis of the losses and lost opportunities to Chilean exporters which had been demonstrated to the Panel. Chile also requested that the Panel propose that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend to the EEC that it take positive measures to compensate Chile for this damage. One possibility for compensation would be an appropriate reduction in the EEC duty rate during the peak period for Chilean apple shipments. The EEC argued that the Panel's terms of reference did not allow it to go beyond the framework of Article XXIII:2, and create new obligations.¹⁷⁴

"The Panel observed that it was customary for a panel examining complaints under paragraph 2 of Article XXIII to make a finding regarding nullification or impairment of benefits and to recommend the termination of measures found to be inconsistent with the General Agreement. It noted that there was no provision in the General Agreement obliging contracting parties to provide compensation, and that the Annex to the 1979 Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance indicated that:

'... The provision of compensation should be resorted to only if the immediate withdrawal of the measure is impracticable and as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the measures which are inconsistent with the General Agreement.'

"The Panel further recalled that a 1965 Secretariat note discussed this issue in relation to residual quantitative restrictions affecting developing countries. This note indicated:

'... Where a proposal for compensation has been made, it would appear that it is open to the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make an assessment of the loss sustained ... and to make a recommendation that pending elimination of these restrictions the country applying such restrictions should consider the establishment of other appropriate concessions which would serve to compensate this loss. There are, however, two points which need to be noted in this connection. Firstly, any such recommendation under the provisions of the present Article XXIII can be implemented only to the extent that it proves acceptable to the contracting party to whom it is addressed. If such contracting party is not in a position to accept the recommendation, the final sanction must remain the authority for withdrawing equivalent obligations as provided in paragraph 2 of Article XXIII.

‘Secondly, the nature of the compensatory concessions and the items on which these are offered would have to be determined by the contracting party to whom the recommendation is directed and would have to be a matter of agreement between the parties concerned. It would not be possible for a panel or other body set up by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to adjudicate on the specific compensations that should be offered ...’

“The Panel endorsed the views contained in this note. It recognized that it would be possible for the EEC and Chile to negotiate compensation consistent with the provisions of the General Agreement; however the Panel did not consider that it would be appropriate for it to make a recommendation on this matter.”¹⁷⁵

Paragraphs 156 and 157 of the 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins” make the following findings and recommendations with respect to the non-violation nullification or impairment claims made:

“The Panel ... found that benefits accruing to the United States under Article II of the General Agreement in respect of the zero tariff bindings for oilseeds in the Community Schedule of Concessions were impaired as a result of the introduction of production subsidy schemes which operate to protect Community producers of oilseeds completely from the movement of prices of imports and thereby prevent the tariff concessions from having any impact on the competitive relationship between domestic and imported oilseeds. The Panel recommends that the CONTRACTING PARTIES suggest that the Community consider ways and means to eliminate the impairment of its tariff concessions for oilseeds.

“The Panel finally considered that, as the inconsistency with Article III:4 and the impairment of the tariff concessions arise from the same Community Regulations, a modification of these Regulations in the light of Article III:4 could also eliminate the impairment of the tariff concessions. The Panel therefore recommends that the CONTRACTING PARTIES take no further action under Article XXIII:2 in relation to the impairment of the tariff concessions until the Community has had a reasonable opportunity to adjust its Regulations to conform to Article III:4”.¹⁷⁸

The 1992 Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on “Follow-up on the Panel Report ‘EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins’” includes the following conclusions:

“With reference to paragraph 156 of the Oilseeds Panel Report, the present Panel finds that benefits accruing to the United States under Article II of the General Agreement in respect of the zero tariff bindings for oilseeds in the Community Schedule of Concessions continue to be impaired by the production subsidy scheme provided for in Council Regulation (EEC) No 3766/91.

“With reference to paragraph 157 of the Oilseeds Panel Report, the Panel considers that there is no reason for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to continue to defer consideration of further action in relation to the impairment of the tariff concessions.

“The Panel accordingly recommends that the Community should act expeditiously to eliminate the impairment of the tariff concessions - either by modifying its new support system for oilseeds or by renegotiating its tariff concessions for oilseeds under Article XXVIII. In the event that the dispute is not resolved expeditiously in either of these ways, the CONTRACTING PARTIES should, if so requested by the United States, consider further action under Article XXIII:2 of the General Agreement".¹⁷⁹

(d) Recommendations in the absence of a finding of either violation or non-violation nullification or impairment

In the discussion at the June 1989 Council meeting of the Panel report on "United States - Trade Measures affecting Nicaragua"¹⁸⁰, which has not been adopted, the representative of Nicaragua stated that the Panel report "could not be adopted unless complementary decisions were also taken. ... the Panel had been unable to fulfil its fundamental tasks under Article XXIII, namely: (a) to make findings as to whether or not the United States was complying with its obligations under the General Agreement ... and (b) to make findings as to whether the embargo nullified or impaired benefits accruing to Nicaragua under the General Agreement ... As the report explained, this had been due to the limitations imposed by the Panel's terms of reference. To adopt the report without any further decisions by the Council to redress this situation would create an extremely dangerous precedent. It would mean that the CONTRACTING PARTIES refused a contracting party's right to have its complaint examined in accordance with Article XXIII:2— a right which, in the case of the application of Article XXI, was recognized by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the Decision of 30 November 1982".¹⁸¹

In Council discussion of the Panel Report on "United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-containing Products applied under the 1955 Waiver and under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions"¹⁸², in which the Panel did not find any inconsistency with the General Agreement and therefore did not propose any recommendations, the EC representative referred to the Council action on the Panel Report on "Spain - Measures concerning Domestic Sale of Soyabean Oil"¹⁸³, and stated that "the Panel had not, indeed, made recommendations, but had merely offered a number of reasonings and conclusions. He wondered what the adoption of the report would mean ... and proposed that the Council take note of the report at hand. ... The representative of the United States said that the basic flaw in the proposal to merely take note of the Panel report on the ground that it contained no recommendation was that, should this approach be followed, it would imply that every time a complainant lost a case, the relevant report would not be adopted".¹⁸⁴ The Panel Report was adopted on 7 November 1990.

(e) Time frame for implementation of recommendations or rulings

At the Sixth Session in September 1951, the delegations of the Netherlands and of Denmark each submitted a complaint under paragraph 2 of Article XXIII regarding the July 1951 enactment by the United States of Section 104 of the Defense Production Act of 1951, which imposed quantitative restrictions and prohibitions on the importation of dairy products into the United States.¹⁸⁵ A number of other contracting parties also indicated that they had requested consultations under Article XXIII:1. The Chairman, summing up the initial discussion of this item at the Sixth Session, noted that "there was general agreement that Section 104 of the Defence Production Act was an infringement of Article XI of the General Agreement. That the provisions of this Article were contravened was accepted by the United States delegation, and, to rectify the situation, the executive branch of the United States Government was making serious efforts to get the repeal of that Section. Secondly, it was clear that if these efforts should fail to produce satisfactory results the matter would have to be considered under Article XXIII of the Agreement regarding impairment and nullification; this might involve withdrawals of concessions by other contracting parties; and it was hoped that it would not prove necessary ...".¹⁸⁶ At the end of the Sixth Session a Resolution was adopted which recognized that concessions had been nullified or impaired and that the import restrictions constituted an infringement of Article XI; recognized that "the circumstances are serious enough to justify recourse ... to Article XXIII paragraph 2” by the contracting parties that had suffered serious damage as a result; and “counsel[ed] the contracting parties affected, in view of the continuing determination of the United States Government to seek the repeal of Section 104 of the United States Defense Production Act and the high priority and urgency which it has stated it will give to further action to this end, to afford to the United States Government a reasonable period of time, as it has requested, in order to rectify the situation through such repeal ...”.¹⁸⁷ Concerning further events in this case, see the material below at pages 690, 693, 695 and 696.

Paragraph 22 of the 1979 Understanding indicates that recommendations by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXIII:2 are to be implemented “within a reasonable period of time”.¹⁸⁸ This obligation has been referred to by various contracting parties as “customary GATT practice”.¹⁸⁹

Footnote 2 to paragraph (e) of the Illustrative List of Export Subsidies annexed to the 1979 Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII of the General Agreement provides inter alia, “Where measures incompatible with the provisions of paragraph (e) exist, and where major practical difficulties stand in the way of the signatory concerned bringing such measures promptly into conformity with the Agreement, the signatory concerned shall, without prejudice to the rights of other signatories under the General Agreement or this Agreement, examine methods for bringing these measures into conformity within a reasonable period of time”.

Paragraph (vii) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides that “.. Where a decision on the findings contained in a report calls for a ruling or a recommendation by the Council, the Council may allow the contracting party concerned a reasonable specified time to indicate what action it proposes to take with a view to a satisfactory settlement of the matter, before making any recommendation or ruling on the basis of the report”.

Paragraphs I(1) and (2) of the 1989 Improvements provide:

“1. Prompt compliance with recommendations or rulings of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXIII is essential in order to ensure effective resolution of disputes to the benefit of all contracting parties.

“2. The contracting party concerned shall inform the Council of its intentions in respect of implementation of the recommendations or rulings. If it is impracticable to comply immediately with the recommendations or rulings, the contracting party concerned shall have a reasonable period of time in which to do so.”

(f) Implementation and other obligations under the General Agreement

At the February 1988 Council meeting, in discussion of the Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products”¹⁹⁰, the representative of Australia cited “a history of bilateral negotiations outside GATT’s scope”, and sought advice from the Secretariat on “whether whatever action taken to implement the report would carry an inherent obligation to act fully within the provisions of the General Agreement, in particular, the obligation to take actions having an m.f.n. effect”. The Deputy Director-General, replying to Australia’s questions, “referred, on the first point, to paragraph 22 of the 1979 Understanding which indicated that the responsibility of the CONTRACTING PARTIES was to keep under review a matter which had been the subject of a recommendation or ruling. If such a recommendation, adopted by the Council, were not implemented, it remained open to the contracting party concerned to bring the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for further action. Were the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make ‘suitable efforts’ on the basis of this referral by the contracting party bringing the case, such efforts could only be made with a view to finding an ‘appropriate solution’, for which only a solution within the terms of the General Agreement would qualify”.¹⁹¹

g) Compensation as a temporary measure pending implementation of recommendations or rulings

During the same discussion referred to immediately above, the representative of Australia asked for Secretariat advice on the question "... if, at some point in the implementation of this report, the question arose of compensation as a means of implementation, whether the following terms of paragraph 4 of the Annex to the 1979 Understanding would fully apply: 'The provision of compensation should be resorted to only if the immediate withdrawal of the measure is impracticable and as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the measures which are inconsistent with the General Agreement'". The Deputy Director-General stated in reply that "his understanding was that it was clearly preferable that a solution mutually acceptable to the parties could be reached before the matter became the subject of a decision by the Council or the CONTRACTING PARTIES. Were that not to be the case, the CONTRACTING PARTIES' action following consideration of the matter and the adoption of any recommendations would be directed, as paragraph 4 of the Annex stated, to securing the 'withdrawal of the measures concerned', and were that not possible, to providing for compensatory adjustment until the withdrawal became possible".¹⁹²

The 1990 Panel Report on "United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products Applied Under the 1955 Waiver and Under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions" notes that the EEC had claimed that restrictions on imports of sugar-containing products were inconsistent with Article XI even whether or not they met the terms of the waiver concerned, that the waiver simply suspended the obligation to implement provisions of the General Agreement, that these restrictions nullified or impaired benefits accruing to the EEC under the General Agreement, and that the EEC was entitled to compensation from the US pending the withdrawal of these restrictions.

"... the Panel noted that Article XXIII:1(b) applies whether or not the measure at issue conflicts with the General Agreement and that, therefore, the question of whether a measure inconsistent with Article XI:1 remains inconsistent with the General Agreement even though covered by a waiver cannot, by itself, determine whether it nullifies or impairs benefits accruing under the General Agreement within the meaning of that provision. ...

"The Panel further examined whether the EEC had provided a detailed justification for its claim that the United States owes compensation for its actions under the Waiver. As pointed out in a previous panel report adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, there is no provision in the General Agreement obliging contracting parties to provide compensation (L/6491, page 48). Paragraph 4 of the Annex to the Understanding on Dispute Settlement which the EEC invokes as a basis for its claim gives contracting parties the possibility to offer compensation as a temporary measure when the immediate withdrawal of a measure found to be inconsistent with the General Agreement is impracticable. A contracting party might, in conformity with that provision, choose to grant compensation to forestall a request for an authorization of retaliatory measures under Article XXIII:2, but the Understanding does not oblige it to do so. The Panel therefore considered that the EEC did not provide the required justification for its claim that the alleged nullification or impairment entitles it to compensation by the United States."¹⁹³

(h) Multilateral surveillance of implementation

Paragraph 22 of the 1979 Understanding provides:

"The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall keep under surveillance any matter on which they have made recommendations or given rulings".

Paragraph (viii) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides:

"... In furtherance of the provisions of paragraph 22 of the Understanding the Council shall periodically review the action taken pursuant to such recommendations. The contracting party to which such a recommendation has been addressed, shall report within a reasonable specified period on action taken or on its reasons for not implementing the recommendation or ruling by the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.

In compliance with this paragraph and with paragraph (ii) of the same 1982 Decision, the Director-General presented to the Council on 9 March 1983 “a full report on the state of the panels presently in operation”.¹⁹⁴ The Director-General thereafter has submitted such reports to the Council every six months, in June and November. In his report to the Council in June 1985, the Director-General noted that at the meeting of the Council on 12 March 1985,¹⁹⁵ it had been suggested that he should include in his regular reports some remarks on the implementation of panel recommendations. Since 1985, the Director-General’s semi-annual report to the Council on the status of work in panels has included a discussion of the status of implementation of panel reports.¹⁹⁶

Paragraph I.3 of the 1989 Improvements provides:

“The Council shall monitor the implementation of recommendations or rulings adopted under Article XXIII:2. The issue of implementation of the recommendations or rulings may be raised at the Council by any contracting party at any time following their adoption. Unless the Council decides otherwise, the issue of implementation of the recommendations or rulings shall be on the agenda of the Council meeting after six months following their adoption and shall remain on the Council’s agenda until the issue is resolved. At least ten days prior to each such Council meeting, the contracting party concerned shall provide the Council with a status report in writing of its progress in the implementation of the panel recommendations or rulings”.

Discussions of implementation of panel reports have been held on numerous occasions since 1989. In July 1992 the Council agreed that its Chairman would hold consultations on the handling of such discussions in Council meetings. In March 1993, the Chairman announced that his consultations had shown that from a purely procedural point of view, the scope of the 1989 Decision did not extend to panel reports which predated it and, consequently, that they should not be listed or considered under this item on the Council’s agenda. It had been pointed out, in this connection, that contracting parties retained the right to raise any issues related to those panel reports under separate agenda items. It had therefore been understood that this item would continue to appear on the agenda in its present form.¹⁹⁷

(i) Proceedings to examine implementation of particular panel reports

In 1962 the CONTRACTING PARTIES made recommendations to seven contracting parties on adopting the Report of the Panel on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII.” The decision in question provides: “As a part of these recommendations the contracting parties concerned were asked to report by 1 March 1963 on action taken to comply with the recommendations or on any other satisfactory adjustment, such as the provision of suitable concessions acceptable to Uruguay. If by that date any recommendation has not been carried out and no satisfactory adjustment has been effected, the circumstances will be deemed to be ‘serious enough’ to justify action under the penultimate sentence of paragraph 2 of Article XXIII and Uruguay will be entitled immediately to request authority to suspend obligations or concessions”.¹⁹⁸ In 1963, this Panel was reconvened at the request of Uruguay, and the Uruguayan delegation requested that it consider the replies received from the seven countries and make a recommendation on the degree of compliance with the CONTRACTING PARTIES’ recommendations.¹⁹⁹

Paragraph 22 of the 1979 Understanding provides:

“... If the CONTRACTING PARTIES’ recommendations are not implemented within a reasonable period of time, the contracting party bringing the case may ask the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make suitable efforts with a view to finding an appropriate solution”.

Paragraph (viii) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision, referred to directly above, further provides: "... The contracting party bringing the case may also ask the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make suitable efforts with a view to finding an appropriate solution as provided in paragraph 22 of the Understanding".

The Panel Report on "United States Tax Legislation (DISC)"²⁰⁰, adopted in December 1981, examined provisions in US tax law providing for deferral of taxes on a portion of income from export sales when such income was held in a "Domestic International Sales Corporation" (DISC). The Panel found that there was a prima facie case of nullification or impairment of benefits. During Council discussion in November 1984 of the US Foreign Sales Corporation Act enacted in response to this panel report, paragraph 22 of the 1979 Understanding was invoked in support of a request for plurilateral consultations to examine the question of the taxes which had been deferred under the DISC legislation and which this new legislation had now forgiven. The representative of the United States objected to the establishment of a plurilateral follow-up review pursuant to paragraph 22 of the 1979 Understanding and said

"that the Community was suggesting that Article XXIII somehow required payment of some kind of back damages, and pointed out that this Article promoted prospective remedies. The FSCA was the response to the DISC Panel report".²⁰¹

At the Council meeting in January 1985 "the Community remained convinced that paragraph 22 of the 1979 Understanding ... provided for the type of consultation that it was requesting [but] in view of the US attitude, decided to follow the procedures adopted on 10 November 1958 under Article XXII on questions affecting the interests of a number of contracting parties (BISD 7S/24)".²⁰²

The Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on "Follow-up on the Panel Report 'EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins'" notes, concerning the background of their work in 1992:

"Following discussions regarding the follow-up on the Oilseeds Panel Report at previous meetings of the Council, the United States proposed at the Council meeting on 8 October 1991 that the original Oilseeds Panel be reconvened for the purpose of assisting the CONTRACTING PARTIES in determining whether measures being taken by the European Economic Community (the Community) would bring its regulations into GATT conformity and would eliminate the impairment of the Community's tariff concessions on oilseeds. Following further discussions in the Council and informal consultations, the CONTRACTING PARTIES at their Forty-Seventh Session reached an agreement on 3 December 1991 (SR.47/1 and DS28/1 refer) under which the members of the original Oilseeds Panel were reconvened to begin work on the basis of document W.47/22 which provides as follows:

'Paragraph I.3 of the "Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures," adopted 12 April 1989 (BISD 36S/61), provides that the Council shall monitor the implementation of recommendations and rulings adopted under Article XXIII:2. Acting pursuant to this provision, the CONTRACTING PARTIES hereby request the Director-General to reconvene the members of the Panel on European Economic Community - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins, adopted on 25 January 1990 (BISD 37S/86), for the purpose of examining whether the measures taken by the European Community in Council Regulation (EEC) 3766/91 of 12 December 1991, establishing a support system for producers of soya beans, rapeseed, colza seed and sunflower seed, comply with the recommendations and rulings, as expressed in the Conclusions (paragraphs 155-157), of the Oilseeds Panel Report as adopted on 25 January 1990. The original Panel Members shall provide such findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES within 90 days of this decision'".²⁰³

The “Introductory Comments” delivered by the Chairman of this body at the first meeting with the parties on 3-4 February 1992, which are attached to this report, indicate that

“... the Members of the original Panel have been reconvened for a specific purpose and not, for example, to re-try the whole case ab initio, or to pass judgement on the consistency of the new Community support system for oilseeds in relation to provisions of the General Agreement other than those that were directly relevant to the original Panel’s reasoning and conclusions ...

“In these circumstances we consider that the Community is required in these proceedings to demonstrate that the measures it has taken satisfy the ruling relating to Article III:4 in paragraph 155 of the Oilseeds Panel Report; and that, in relation to the ruling in paragraph 156 of that report, as qualified by paragraph 157 thereof, the Community would be expected to demonstrate, if this is what the Community is asserting, that the measures it has taken have in fact also eliminated the impairment of concessions as found by the original Panel. In other words, if the assertion of the Community is that the impairment of concessions as found by the original Panel has been eliminated, then this body would expect the Community to substantiate its assertion because this is a matter which has a bearing on the matters to be examined by this body and on the nature of the findings it is required to make in terms of its mandate”.²⁰⁴

For the conclusions of this body, see page 683 above.

(5) “may consult with ... the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations and with any appropriate intergovernmental organization ... where ... necessary”

During the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee in Geneva, it was stated that consultations with other intergovernmental organizations might prove “necessary” before taking action in “a general deflationary situation” where the matter was not exclusively within the competence of the ITO and where remedial action might best be taken outside the field of activity of the ITO. It was noted in this connection that the inclusion of the words “if necessary” meant that “if the matter is exclusively one within the competence of the ITO itself, then the ITO is not called upon to consult with anybody”.²⁰⁵

As noted at page 669 above, the Report of the Review Working Party on “Organizational and Functional Questions” in 1955 notes, in connection with the rejection of a proposal to include in the General Agreement provisions for initiating consultations in urgent cases to prevent the international spread of a decline in employment, production or demand, that “... the kind of action [proposed] was already provided for in existing or proposed new Articles of the Agreement. It was clear, for example, that Article XXIII contemplates that any country which considers that a situation had arisen which impeded the attainment of any objective of the Agreement ... may refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which then would be obliged promptly to investigate the matter and to make appropriate recommendations. It was also clear that in such a case the CONTRACTING PARTIES would be free to enter into consultations with other interested international bodies which would be in a position to make a contribution to the problem presented”.²⁰⁶

In 1951, a working party was established under Article XXIII:2 to examine a United States complaint concerning Belgian restrictions on imports from the dollar area. The terms of the reference of the working party provided that “In its consideration of this matter, the Working Party should consult as necessary with the International Monetary Fund in accordance with Article XV of the General Agreement”.²⁰⁷ The 1990 Panel Report on “Thailand - Restrictions on Importation of and Internal Taxes on Cigarettes” notes that this Panel consulted with officials of the World Health Organization in accordance with the request of Thailand and the understanding between the parties to the dispute that “Thailand will make a request for the Panel to consult with competent international organizations on technical aspects such as the health effects of cigarette use and consumption ... if Thailand makes such a request, the Panel may so consult”.²⁰⁸

(6) “serious enough”

As noted above on page 684, on 26 October 1951 at the Sixth Session, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Resolution on “United States Import Restrictions on Dairy Products” which provided inter alia that “concessions granted by the United States Government to contracting parties under the General Agreement have been nullified or impaired within the meaning of Article XXIII of the General Agreement ... a large number of contracting parties have indicated that they have suffered serious damage as a result of this nullification or impairment, and ... the circumstances are serious enough to justify recourse by those contracting parties to Article XXIII paragraph 2”. However, the Resolution urged the contracting parties affected, in view of the continuing determination of the United States Government to seek repeal of the import restrictions to afford to the United States “a reasonable period of time, as it has requested, in order to rectify the situation through such repeal”.²⁰⁹

During the Review Session of 1954-55, the Review Working Party on Organizational and Functional Questions considered various proposals for the amendment of Article XXIII. Denmark, Norway and Sweden proposed to add the following interpretative note to paragraph 2 of Article XXIII: “It is understood that the recommendation referred to in paragraph 2 should aim at a positive solution of the matter through the removal of the measure or measures in question or the provision of compensation for the damage suffered. As a rule retaliatory measures should not be authorized unless such recommendations have failed to lead to a solution within a reasonable period of time”.²¹⁰ The Report of the Working Party notes as follows:

“... The representative of the Scandinavian countries, when introducing the proposal, stressed that action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXIII should be directed towards the maintenance of a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions not less favourable to trade than that provided for in the original situation; it was, therefore, desirable that resort should be had to retaliatory action only when all other possibilities had been explored.

“The proposal was withdrawn in the light of the agreement by the Working Party that, subject to the qualifications explained in the following paragraph, the principle set out in the proposed interpretative note conformed with both the intention of the Article and the practice the CONTRACTING PARTIES had hitherto followed in applying its provisions. The Working Party considered that the requirement in paragraph 2 of the Article that the circumstances must be ‘serious enough’ limits the possibility of authorizing a contracting party or parties to take appropriate retaliatory action to cases where endeavours to solve the problem through the withdrawal of the measures causing the damage, the substitution of other concessions, or some other appropriate action have not proved to be possible, and where there is considered to be a substantial justification for retaliatory action, as in cases in which such authorization appears to be the only means either of preventing serious economic consequences to the country for which a benefit has been nullified or impaired, or the only means of restoring the original situation”.²¹¹

The 1962 Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” notes that “the requirement that the situation must be serious enough limits the applicability of the provision to cases where there is nullification or impairment; it would at any rate be difficult to conceive a situation in which the suspension of concessions or obligations could be appropriate where nullification or impairment was not involved”.²¹² The Recommendation adopted on 16 November 1962 with this Panel report provides in part:

“On adopting the report of the Panel on Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII, the CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting pursuant to paragraph 2 of that Article, made certain recommendations to the Governments of ...

“As part of these recommendations the contracting parties concerned were asked to report by 1 March 1963 on action taken to comply with the recommendations or on any other satisfactory adjustment, such as the provision of suitable concessions acceptable to Uruguay. If by that date any recommendation has not been carried out and no satisfactory adjustment has been effected, the circumstances will be deemed to be 'serious enough' to justify action under the penultimate sentence of paragraph 2 of Article XXIII and Uruguay will be entitled immediately to request authority to suspend obligations or concessions ...".²¹³

As regards this two-stage procedure, the Panel Report notes:

"In recommending this two-stage procedure, the Panel had principally in mind, once again, the requirement stated in Article XXIII:2 that the situation must be 'serious enough' before suspension can be authorized. It noted, as a report of the ninth session (BISD 3S/250-251) had made clear, that the action of authorization of suspension of concessions or obligations should never be taken except as a last resort; it also noted that the aim of Uruguay at this stage was to seek the prompt removal of the measures in question".²¹⁴

The 1984 Panel Report on "United States Manufacturing Clause" found, inter alia, that a clause of the US copyright law was inconsistent with Article XI:1 and that this inconsistency could not be justified under the Protocol of Provisional Application. The Panel also found as follows:

"The Panel noted that the US had argued that, even if the Panel were to find nullification or impairment of a benefit accruing to the European Communities under the General Agreement, the circumstances would not be serious enough to justify authorization of a suspension of obligations or concessions under Article XXIII:2, since the European Communities had suffered no economic harm. The Panel decided not to examine this argument, because the complaining party, the European Communities, had not requested the Panel to make findings concerning the authorization of suspension of concessions under Article XXIII".²¹⁵

The Panel Report notes that at the time of the panel proceeding, the clause was scheduled to expire on 1 July 1986. In a communication of 28 February 1986 the EEC noted its "deep concern that legislation has now been tabled in the United States Congress with a view not only to render the Clause permanent but even to expand its coverage. ... Were such legislation to be adopted, the United States would not only have failed to implement the Panel recommendation; it would knowingly have enacted new legislation in breach of its international obligations and commitments ...". The EEC requested authority under Article XXIII:2 "to suspend the application of concessions towards the United States equivalent to the economic damage caused to the Communities. The Community proposes that such suspension should become applicable in the event that further legislation inconsistent with GATT comes into effect in the United States in succession to the present Manufacturing Clause after its expiry ...".²¹⁶ In Council discussion in April 1986, the EC representative asked the Council to consider the possible extension of the clause, nearly two years after the Report had found it to be inconsistent with Article XI, as being "sufficiently serious ... to justify the suspension of concessions to the United States as provided in Article XXIII:2. This matter should be treated as a question of principle, irrespective of the volume of trade involved, because a contracting party would not only be failing to remove a measure found to be inconsistent with GATT but would be extending and enlarging the scope of the measure".²¹⁷ He further stated that the circumstances would be even more serious if the new legislation were to take effect.²¹⁸ The clause expired on 1 July 1986.²¹⁹

At the October 1990 Council meeting, referring to the 1988 Panel Report on "Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Alcoholic Drinks by Canadian Provincial Marketing Agencies"²²⁰ the United States stated that practices referred to in the Panel Report "remained in place despite Canada's obligation to bring them into GATT-conformity", and requested that "the Council decide, pursuant to Article XXIII:2, that the circumstances concerning this matter were serious enough to authorize the United States to suspend the application to Canada of appropriate concessions or other obligations". In addition, the United States sought

Council authorization to withdraw concessions in the event that Canada did not comply with the Panel's recommendations. The representative of the EEC, which was the applicant party in the 1988 proceeding, said that the Community "welcomed the fact that the United States, in defence of its trade interests, took recourse, for the first time, to the procedures of Article XXIII:2 to request authorization to suspend the application of US GATT concessions".²²¹ At the following Council meeting in November, the US representative stated that the United States would request establishment of a panel and would request that the 1988 Panel be reconvened and make findings on an expedited basis.²²²

(7) "may authorize ... to suspend"

At its meeting on 8-9 February 1989²²³ the Council agreed to a suggestion by the European Communities that prior to the approval of the agenda, there be a general discussion on the subject of unilateral measures. After statements by a number of contracting parties on this subject, the Director-General commented that "... His own conclusion was to remind governments that the cornerstone of cooperation under the GATT was their readiness to submit their differences of views as to the GATT-conformity of their measures to the process of consultation and dispute settlement provided by the General Agreement.

"He considered it his duty to refer to what the drafters of the Havana Charter had in mind when they had evolved this concept of cooperation through the use of the process of consultation and dispute settlement, and in particular in respect of the recourse to unilateral measures. He quoted Clair Wilcox, one of the drafters of the Havana Charter, who had said 'we have introduced [in the Havana Charter provisions corresponding to Article XXIII:2] a new principle in international economic relations. We have asked the nations of the world to confer upon an international organization the right to limit their power to retaliate. We have sought to tame retaliation, to discipline it, to keep it within bounds. By subjecting it to the restraints of international control, we have endeavoured to check its spread and growth, to convert it from a weapon of economic warfare to an instrument of international order'.²²⁴

"As for 'finger-pointing', he said that he had no fingers but he did have the General Agreement by which all contracting parties were bound. This Agreement said that discriminatory import tariffs were contrary to its Article I. There was no exception in the General Agreement which could justify discriminatory import tariffs imposed for the particular purpose of inducing another contracting party to bring its trade policies into conformity with the General Agreement. The CONTRACTING PARTIES could, however, - in particular where it was found that a contracting party was maintaining measures contrary to the General Agreement - be requested to authorize, in accordance with Article XXIII:2, the suspension of obligations towards a contracting party failing to observe its obligations under the General Agreement".²²⁵

(a) Suspension of concessions under Article XXIII:2 and proposals therefor

The 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides in paragraph 4:

"... The last resort which Article XXIII provides to the country invoking this procedure is the possibility of suspending the application of concessions or other obligations on a discriminatory basis vis-a-vis the other contracting party, subject to authorization by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of such measures. Such action has only rarely been contemplated and cases taken under Article XXIII:2 have led to such action in only one case."

The instance referred to by this paragraph occurred in 1952. As noted above at pages 684 and 690, a Resolution adopted in the Sixth Session on "United States Import Restrictions on Dairy Products" determined that the circumstances were "serious enough", and required a follow-up report by the United States not later than the opening of the Seventh Session in 1952. During discussion in the Intersessional Committee between the Sixth and Seventh Sessions, the issue was raised whether this Resolution in itself provided authorization for the suspension of application of concessions under Article XXIII:2.

“The Chairman agreed with the interpretation of the Netherlands representative, that no contracting party was entitled to take retaliatory action towards the United States until an authorization had been obtained from the CONTRACTING PARTIES in terms of Article XXIII:2; the purpose of requiring such an authorization was to prevent contracting parties from taking unnecessary and excessive measures in retaliation. It was clear from the provisions of the Agreement that if the United States Government should fail to secure the repeal of the legislation in question and to re-open its market to European exporters of dairy products, the European contracting parties concerned would have to present their case to the CONTRACTING PARTIES and to request an authorization for retaliatory action ...”²²⁶

At the Seventh Session, having received the report that these import restrictions had not been repealed²²⁷, the CONTRACTING PARTIES agreed to establish a Working Party to examine the proposal made at the Sixth Session by the Netherlands for measures to be taken under Article XXIII:2.²²⁸ On 8 November 1952 the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted the Report of the Working Party and the Determination therein on “Netherlands measures of suspension of obligation to the United States”.²²⁹ This Determination authorized the Netherlands to “suspend the application to the United States of their obligations under the General Agreement to the extent necessary to allow the Netherlands Government to impose an upper limit of 60,000 metric tons on imports of wheat flour from the United States during the calendar year 1953”.²³⁰ See also the material at page 696 and following on how the amount of this suspension was determined.

At the same meeting the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Resolution which confirmed the findings in the Sixth Session Resolution, recommended “notwithstanding any recourse that contracting parties may take to Article XXIII while these restrictions are in effect ... that the United States Government ... continue its efforts to seek the repeal of Section 104 of the Defense Production Act as the only satisfactory solution of this problem” and requested a further report by the United States no later than the opening of the Eighth Session.²³¹

In 1962, a Panel Report on “French Import Restrictions” suggested that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend to the French Government the withdrawal of import restrictions which the Panel found were inconsistent with Article XI. The Panel also suggested

“that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend to the United States Government that it refrain, for a reasonable period, from exercising its right, under the procedures of paragraph 2 of Article XXIII, to propose suspension of the application of equivalent obligations or concessions”.²³²

On 8 September 1972, the United States made a proposal to suspend tariff concessions on articles of French origin covering trade of US$12.2 million, because the French Government had not withdrawn import restrictions inconsistent with Article XI.²³³ At the Council meeting of 19 September 1972, the United States stated that although some restrictions had been removed, full satisfaction had not been obtained, and it had not been possible to achieve agreement on elimination of remaining import restrictions within two years. The Chairman of the Council “reaffirmed the conclusions and recommendations of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, as set out in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the Panel Report of 14 November 1962, and in particular the entitlement of the United States to make a proposal regarding the suspension of the application to France of equivalent obligations and concessions, in

In 1985 Canada referred to the Netherlands suspension and the US proposal of 1972 in support of its requests for the establishment of a Panel on "United States - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Sugar-containing Products" and for Council authorization of immediate suspensions of obligations on an interim basis pending the results of the Panel's deliberations.²³⁵ The panel was established but the Council did not agree to authorize such a suspension.²³⁶

See the material above on page 691 concerning the request by the EEC in 1986 for suspension of concessions in the event of enactment of legislation extending the "manufacturing clause" of the United States copyright law. That request did not include a quantification of the amount nor a list of products with respect to which action would be taken.²³⁷

In connection with the follow-up on the 1987 Panel Report on "United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances", which was adopted in June 1987, the EEC requested on 11 March 1988 that the "Council authorize it, in accordance with the provisions of Article XXIII:2 of the General Agreement, to suspend the application to the United States of concessions equivalent to the economic injury caused to the Community". The request noted that "The Community and other contracting parties have repeatedly raised the question of the implementation by the United States of the Panel's recommendation, but without being able to obtain satisfactory results. Furthermore, the United States has not offered any compensation". The EEC later stated that in its view there was "an annual injury for the Community of US$7.24 million" and circulated a list of products with respect to which the EEC proposed to levy an additional duty of 2.5 per cent ad valorem.²³⁸ In connection with the same Panel Report, on 28 September 1989 Canada requested "the authority of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to suspend the application to the United States of concessions substantially equivalent to the economic injury caused to Canada due to the failure of the United States to comply with the conclusions of the panel report adopted by the Council in June 1987". The request included a figure for annual injury to Canada of US$9.2 million, calculated by the same method as in the EEC request above, and a list of products with respect to which Canada proposed to apply an additional duty of 2.5 per cent ad valorem.²³⁹ See further the discussion on these two requests below at page 698.

At the 14 July 1992 Council meeting, the United States raised the issue of follow-up to the 1992 Panel Report on "Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies".²⁴¹ Citing measures adopted by the province of Ontario since the 18 February 1992 adoption of this Panel Report, the United States requested the Council to authorize the suspension of concessions with respect to Canada in an amount not to exceed US$80.7 million.²⁴² The representative of Canada stated that "Canada regarded the United States' request for authority to suspend concessions as unwarranted because the United States had not provided the Council with a sufficient basis on which to address the question. A proper request would call for an indication to the Council prior to its meeting of the specific action being proposed, i.e., the product coverage, the amount of trade involved and the tariff rates to be applied Canada was prepared to have the Council agree to an expedited review of the specific measures raised by the United States, namely the increase in Ontario's environmental levy, the operation of the import monopoly and the pricing of beer imported into Ontario. This could be done along the lines of paragraph 19.5 of the draft text on dispute settlement in the Uruguay Round Draft Final Act (MTN.TNC/W/FA) which called for an examination and decision within ninety days ... Retaliation without the authorization of the CONTRACTING PARTIES was clearly contrary to GATT obligations. Were the United States to disregard its obligations and retaliate against Canadian products without the authority of the Council, Canada reserved the right to respond accordingly".²⁴³

The United States representative responded that "The United States did not consider it acceptable for the GATT to respond to this continuing discrimination by suggesting that the appropriate mechanism was yet another panel report. Presumably, once another panel report had been issued, Ontario would make another minor change in its law in a way that would require the United States to come back to the GATT again".²⁴⁴ On 27 July 1992, Canada informed the CONTRACTING PARTIES that on 24 July, the United States had imposed a surtax of 50 per cent ad valorem on imports of beer brewed or bottled in Ontario, affecting exports of over C$99 million in 1991; and that Canada would impose a surtax of 50 per cent ad valorem on imports of beer brewed by two United States companies destined for the province of Ontario, affecting some C$9.3 million in trade, to be removed upon removal of the United States surtax. Canada stated as well that it would accept the result of an expedited examination of the issues, that this examination could include the issue of damages, and that "Canada would not stand in the way of a properly constituted decision of the Council on suspension of concessions".²⁴⁵ At the September 1992 Council meeting, there was a difference of views between Canada and the United States as to whether the issues being complained of had been subject to adjudication by a panel, and as to the desirability of the expedited review proposed by Canada. A number of other contracting parties expressed concern at the use of unilateral measures.²⁴⁶

At the November 1992 Council meeting, in discussion of the follow-up to the 31 March 1992 Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on "Follow-up on the Panel Report on 'EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins'",²⁴⁷ the United States requested under Article XXIII:2 "that the Chairman put the following proposition to the Council at the present meeting: 'The CONTRACTING PARTIES authorize the United States to suspend the application to the European Community of concessions under the General Agreement in the amount of US$1 billion'".²⁴⁸ In the discussion of this request the representative of the EEC stated that "The present situation in this dispute stemmed from the report of the reconvened Panel members, which had recommended that the Community act promptly to eliminate the impairment of its tariff concessions by modifying its oilseed subsidy scheme or by renegotiating its concessions under Article XXVIII. The Community had not been requested to combine the two alternatives, but had been allowed to choose between them; it had accordingly chosen the Article XXVIII procedure, with the Council's approval. The Council should therefore be consistent and not tamper with the Community's choice. He recognized that the Panel's recommendation had also stated that in the event that the dispute was not resolved expeditiously in either of these ways, the CONTRACTING PARTIES should, if requested by the United States, consider further action under Article XXIII:2. He did not challenge the United States' right to seek authorization for the withdrawal of concessions, but he could answer neither positively nor negatively".²⁴⁹ See also above at page 683 and below at pages 696 and 700.

same reasons as the United States delegation, would abstain from voting on the decision”.²⁵¹ The Report was adopted with the United States and Netherlands abstaining.²⁵²

Paragraph (x) of the 1982 Ministerial Declaration provides:

“The Parties to a dispute would fully ... participate and have their views recorded in the considerations of the further actions provided for under paragraphs (viii) and (ix) above. The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirmed that consensus will continue to be the traditional method of resolving disputes; however, they agreed that obstruction in the process of dispute settlement shall be avoided.¹ It is understood that decisions in this process cannot add to or diminish the rights and obligations provided in the General Agreement”.

Footnote 1 to this paragraph provides: “This does not prejudice the provisions on decision making in the General Agreement”.

At the November 1992 Council meeting at the close of the discussion on the follow-up to the 31 March 1992 Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on “Follow-up on the Panel Report on ‘EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Products of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins’”,²⁵³ the Chairman noted that “the Council had a specific request from the United States for an authorization to suspend concessions under Article XXIII:2, and he was unable to pronounce any consensus thereon”.²⁵⁴

(8) “such concessions or other obligations under this Agreement as they determine to be appropriate in the circumstances”

(a) Basis of suspension under Article XXIII:2

During negotiation of the General Agreement in 1947, it was stated that this phrase, taken from the nullification or impairment Article of the Charter, “clearly means ... the concession is suspended in respect of the trade of a particular Member ... If a particular Member takes action contrary to the Charter, other Members may suspend the application to the trade of that Member of concessions granted. That means that other countries should not be penalized because one country has failed to carry out its commitments”.²⁵⁵

See also the references at pages 693 and 698 to the 1972 proposal by the United States under Article XXIII to suspend concessions with respect to imports originating in France, and to the Chairman’s statement in response.

(b) Determination of extent of suspension under Article XXIII:2

The 1952 Report of the Working Party in the Seventh Session on “Netherlands Action under Article XXIII:2 to Suspend Obligations to the United States” provides as follows:

“... the Netherlands delegation requested the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in accordance with Article XXIII:2, to authorise the Netherlands to suspend the application to the United States of its obligations under the Agreement to the extent necessary to allow the Netherlands to impose an upper limit of 57,000 metric tons on imports of wheat flour from the United States during the calendar year 1953. This would constitute an annual reduction of approximately 15,000 metric tons from the rate of current imports from the United States.

“The Working Party was instructed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to investigate the appropriateness of the measure which the Netherlands Government proposed to take, having regard to its equivalence to the impairment suffered by the Netherlands as a result of the United States restrictions.

²⁵⁵EPCT/TAC/PV/18, p. 42.

“The Working Party felt that the appropriateness of the measure envisaged by the Netherlands Government should be considered from two points of view: in the first place whether, in the circumstances, the measure proposed was appropriate in character, and secondly, whether the extent of the quantitative restriction proposed by the Netherlands Government was reasonable, having regard to the impairment suffered.

“Although the Working Party recognized that it was appropriate to consider calculations of the trade affected by the measures and countermeasures in question, it was aware that a purely statistical test would not, by itself, be sufficient and that it would also be necessary to consider the broader economic elements entering into the assessment of the impairment suffered. It was agreed therefore that it would be proper to take into account the contention of the Netherlands Government that the restrictions imposed by the United States had had serious effects on the efforts which were being made by the Netherlands to stimulate its exports to the United States not only of the products subject to the restrictions but of other products as well, and the further contention of the Netherlands Government that the restrictions had affected its efforts to overcome balance-of-payments difficulties with which the country was confronted.

“The Working Party recognised the difficulties inherent in fixing, with any real precision, the point at which any proposed measure could no longer be considered reasonable. ... the Working Party decided to recommend a measure somewhat different in magnitude form that proposed by the Netherlands.”²⁵⁶

The Chairman of the Working Party stated concerning its Report that he “wished to make it clear that the Working Party’s considerations had included various statistical calculations, the additional elements of the damage suffered, and finally, the purpose for which the measure was proposed. As stated in the report, this examination led to two conclusions - first that the measure proposed was not unreasonable, and secondly that the somewhat lower figure would be more appropriate in the sense best calculated to achieve the purpose for which the measure was taken, i.e. the removal of the United States restrictions. In his view the test of appropriateness under Article XXIII was a different concept from mere reasonableness, in that account must be taken of the desirability of limiting such action to that best calculated in the circumstances to achieve the objective”.²⁵⁷

The Determination of 8 November 1952 on “Netherlands Measures of Suspension of Obligations to the United States” provides

- “1. that the measure proposed by the Netherlands Government is appropriate in character, and
 - “2. that, having regard to
 - “(i) the value of the trade involved,
 - “(ii) the broader elements in the impairment suffered by the Netherlands, and
 - “(iii) the statement of the Netherlands Government that its principal objective in proposing the measure in question is to contribute to the eventual solution of the matter in accordance with the objectives and spirit of the General Agreement,
- the limitation by the Netherlands of imports of wheat flour from the United States to 60,000 tons in 1953 would be appropriate within the meaning of Article XXIII ...”.

and authorizes the Netherlands Government “to suspend the application to the United States of their obligations under the General Agreement to the extent necessary to allow the Netherlands Government to impose an upper limit of 60,000 metric tons on imports of wheat flour from the United States during the calendar year 1953”.²⁵⁸

The Report of the Panel on the “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” on its work when it was reconvened in 1963 notes that the Panel forwarded to the Uruguayan delegation its comments on reports made by the contracting parties to which the recommendations had been addressed, and further notes: "The Panel stands ready to deal with any proposals which Uruguay, after further reflection, might wish to submit in terms of the penultimate sentence of Article XXIII:2, concerning the suspension of Uruguay's obligations and concessions. In that event, the Panel expects promptly to recommend, for consideration and approval by the Council, whether, in each case, the proposed compensation was or was not appropriate in the circumstances".²⁵⁹

As noted above at page 693, in 1972 the United States gave notice, as a follow-up to the 1962 Panel Report on "French Import Restrictions", that as the Government of France had not withdrawn all of the restrictions found by that Panel to be inconsistent with Article XI, "in conformity with the recommendation of the decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 14 November 1962, the United States has decided to exercise its right to propose suspension of equivalent concessions" on articles of French origin covering trade of US$12.2 million.²⁶⁰ At the Council meeting of 19 September 1972 the United States further described its proposal as follows:

"This amount covered only the impairment attributed to restrictions on agricultural products and the United States reserved its position as to the industrial products concerned. The amount was based on a conservative estimate of what, in the absence of quantitative restrictions, United States exports could be of three agricultural products: canned fruit, dried prunes and dried and dehydrated vegetables. No account had been taken of restrictions remaining on certain tomato products. The estimate was based on trends of United States exports in other European markets which were free from restrictions and also reflected United States export experience under quotas and French administrative arrangements. The United States delegation considered this a fair proposal which, in their view, should be acceptable to the Council".

The Chairman pointed out that "in a case like this, the Council normally would wish to seek the recommendations of a panel of experts on the question of the appropriateness of the United States proposal, in particular as to the amount of trade coverage involved. ... he suggested that the two parties concerned should consult between themselves with a view to reaching agreement, in particular as regards the amount proposed by the United States". The two parties so agreed.²⁶¹ No further action was taken by the Council, as a bilateral solution was reached.

Article 18.9 of the 1979 Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII provides that "... If the Committee's recommendations are not followed within a reasonable period, the Committee may authorize appropriate countermeasures (including withdrawal of GATT concessions or obligations) taking into account the nature and degree of the adverse effect found to exist. ..."²⁶²

The Panel Report on "United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances"²⁶³ was adopted on 17 June 1987. The implementation of this Panel Report was raised in the Council and at the Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES a number of times in 1987, 1988 and 1989 by the parties to the dispute and by other contracting parties. As noted above at page 694, in March and April 1988 the EEC requested the Council to authorize, in accordance with Article XXIII:2, the retaliatory withdrawal of equivalent concessions granted to the United States in respect of specific products.²⁶⁴ At the May 1988 Council meeting, the United States representative, supported by a number of delegations, stated that his Government could not agree to the request and proposed that a working party be convened to examine it. In response to questions on calculation of the level of damages and the work of such a working party, the Legal Adviser to the Director-General stated that "... there were a few provisions in the General Agreement where retaliation was foreseen. In two of those, Articles XIX and XXVIII, retaliation was defined as the withdrawal of substantially equivalent concessions. In the case of Article XXIII, the wording was wider, referring to measures determined to be appropriate in the circumstances, which meant that there was a wider leeway in calculating the retaliatory measures under Article XXIII than under Articles XIX or XXVIII A working party in the present case would examine whether the retaliatory measures proposed by the Community would be appropriate in the circumstances; that would include the question of how to calculate the damage and the compensation”.²⁶⁵

At the June 1988 Council meeting the Chairman stated that “there were essentially technical questions to be answered, and a working party might not be the most suitable way to address them”.²⁶⁶ At its 22 September 1988 meeting, the Council discussed a Secretariat Note providing technical advice on, inter alia, the correctness of the Community’s assessment of damages.²⁶⁷ The representative of Mexico remarked concerning the Secretariat Note that

“... from a legal point of view, the Secretariat had begun with the premise of the withdrawal of substantially equivalent concessions which, while applicable to the renegotiation of concessions under Article XXVIII of the General Agreement, did not correspond to the letter or spirit of Article XXIII:2, which was the applicable Article in dispute settlement cases This question was of paramount importance in distinguishing between renegotiations of concessions consistent with GATT rules, and measures which were GATT-inconsistent. The latter implied a different response in order to re-establish provisionally the balance between a contracting party’s rights and obligations ... one had to take into consideration the purpose for which the action had been proposed, i.e. the elimination of the US measure”.²⁶⁸

The Deputy Director-General confirmed that

“... Article XXIII:2, unlike Article XXVIII, did not speak about equivalent concessions. Therefore, it was not really a question of authorizing the withdrawal of equivalent concessions as such. That was why the Secretariat had pointed out that Article XXIII did not require that the amount of retaliation should be equivalent, and that the CONTRACTING PARTIES might wish to determine what other factors to take into account in examining the appropriateness of the proposed retaliatory measure. All the Secretariat could do was to help in an examination of the appropriateness of the retaliatory measure to be taken by the Community. It could not, in the context of the advice given to the Community, take into account what would be the appropriate level of the retaliatory measures that might be authorized on a global basis. In this case, it was the Community which had indicated what retaliatory action it wished to take; any other contracting party which considered that its interests were affected had the possibility of indicating that - as all other means of solving the problem had failed in its view to provide results - this was the action it would propose to take. Then, of course, it would be for the CONTRACTING PARTIES in their best judgment to decide whether to authorize that action”.²⁶⁹

As an interim solution the United States proposed negotiations with affected contracting parties on the issue of compensatory adjustments pending the early elimination by Congress of the GATT-inconsistent aspects of the tax.

In connection with the September 1989 request by Canada for authorization to withdraw concessions in connection with the same matter (referred to above at page 694), Canada stated at the October 1989 Council meeting that “Canada believed that the Council possessed sufficient information to allow it to determine the two essential points: (1) that the circumstances were serious enough to warrant Canada’s proposed action, and (2) that Canada’s request was appropriate in the circumstances. One option for dealing with this matter would be to establish a small group, perhaps along the lines of a panel, to examine Canada’s request against these two criteria and to report quickly. Both Canada and the United States could present information to the group, but neither would participate in the group’s decision. This would be consistent with the only existing precedent, established in 1952, regarding a dispute between the Netherlands and United States. ... the term ‘small group’ had been used in the case of the 1952 precedent. The small group had operated in fact along the lines of a panel, having heard arguments from the two sides on the question of whether (1) the circumstances had been serious enough to warrant the action, and (2) the action proposed had been appropriate in the circumstances. The group had then made up its mind, in the absence of the two parties concerned, and had come up very quickly with its recommendation ... ”.²⁷⁰ At this and the October 1989 Council meeting the United States indicated that it could not accept such a group.²⁷¹

See also above at page 694 concerning the proposal of Canada in 1992 for an expedited review to combine examination of measures cited by the United States in connection with the implementation of the 1992 Panel Report on “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies”²⁷² and the issue of damages.

At the September 1992 Council meeting, in connection with the discussion of the follow-up to the 31 March 1992 Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on “Follow-up on the Panel Report on ‘EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins’”,²⁷³ the United States requested that the Council establish an arbitral body “solely to determine the total value to be ascribed to the nullification or impairment” which would be composed of the two surviving members of the original oilseeds panel and a third member to be selected by the Director-General. The arbitration panel would render its decision in thirty days and its determination would be binding on both the United States and the EEC.²⁷⁴ The EEC representative noted in response that arbitration could only be voluntary and there was no obligation to accept such a procedure; the Community could not accept the proposed arbitration procedure, not only in the oilseeds case, but also more generally because of the GATT precedent it would create. After debate, the Chairman said that it had not been possible to build consensus for the arbitration proposal of the United States.²⁷⁵

C. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE XXIII AND OTHER GATT ARTICLES

1. General

As noted in Section III below, the Charter provisions corresponding to Article XXII (on consultations in respect of commercial policy measures) were located in the commercial policy chapter, Chapter IV, and the nullification and impairment provisions corresponding to Article XXIII applied to the entire Charter and were located in Chapter VIII. The Havana Reports record the following notification to other Committees of the Havana Conference by the Sixth Committee, which considered Chapter VIII:

“The Sixth Committee has discussed the question of the relationship between Chapter VIII and other parts of the Charter. In the light of its discussion the Committee wishes to make known to other Committees of the Conference that, in its opinion, where an article of the Charter other than those contained in Chapter VIII establishes procedures for action by a Member or by the Organization, action in accordance with that procedure should precede that provided for in Chapter VIII, but shall not, unless it is so specified, impair the rights of Members under Chapter VIII. However, it is the view of the Committee that if consultation or investigation has taken place under the provisions of another article, the Organization may regard such consultation or investigation as fulfilling, either in whole or in part, any similar procedural requirement in Chapter VIII”.²⁷⁶

2. Article VI

The report of the Havana Sub-Committee on the customs articles of the Charter notes that “It was ... the general view of the Sub-Committee that the point of chief concern to [certain countries] ... (i.e. adequate means for dealing with abuses by a Member unnecessarily levying anti-dumping or countervailing duties) was adequately covered by the general provisions of the Charter, particularly by Articles 41 [XXII] and 93 [XXIII]”.²⁷⁷

The 1955 Panel Report on “Swedish Anti-Dumping Duties” examined a Swedish Decree imposing a basic price scheme under which an anti-dumping duty was levied on imports of nylon stockings whenever the invoice price was lower than a minimum price fixed by the Swedish Government. The Italian government had argued that the Decree was inconsistent with Article VI because “the Swedish Government has not proved that the export of Italian nylon stockings has been carried out at dumping prices or that the conditions referred to in Article VI (for example, material injury to national products) have been fulfilled”.²⁷⁸

“The Panel ... considered the argument developed by the Italian representative to the effect that the Swedish Decree [on a basic price scheme for stocking imports] reversed the onus of proof since the customs authorities can act without being required to prove the existence of dumping practices or even to establish a prima facie case of dumping. ... it was clear from the wording of Article VI that no anti-dumping duties should be levied unless certain facts had been established. As this represented an obligation of the contracting party imposing such duties, it would be reasonable to expect that that contracting party should establish the existence of these facts when its action is challenged”.²⁷⁹

“... The Italian delegation contended that the main injury suffered by exporters was due to the fact that the Swedish Government was levying an anti-dumping duty on Italian stockings although it had not established that the export prices of the products were less than the normal value of those products as required in Article VI of the GATT. The Panel agreed that if the Swedish Decree was being applied in such a manner as to impose an anti-dumping levy in the absence of dumping practices, the Italian Government ... could claim an impairment of benefits.

“The Swedish representative stated that it appeared doubtful to his delegation that the CONTRACTING PARTIES could consider that question and that it was the right of the national authorities to decide whether dumping had really taken place. The Panel agreed that no provision of the General Agreement could limit in any way the rights of national authorities in that respect. But for the reason set forth in paragraph 15 above, it would be reasonable to expect from the contracting party which resorts to the provisions of Article VI, if such action is challenged, to show to the satisfaction of the CONTRACTING PARTIES that it had exercised its rights consistently with those provisions”.²⁸⁰

In the 1985 Panel Report on “New Zealand - Imports of Electrical Transformers from Finland”,

“The Panel ... considered the evidence put forward by both sides as to the appropriateness of the cost elements used by the New Zealand authorities in arriving at their decision that dumping had occurred. The Panel noted that this evidence was of a highly technical nature, especially because it related to complicated custom-built products. It also noted that Article VI did not contain any specific guidelines for the calculation of cost-of-production and considered that the method used in this particular case appeared to be a reasonable one. In view of this and having noted the arguments put forward by both sides as regards the costing of certain inputs used in the manufacture of the transformers, the Panel considered that there was no basis on which to disagree with the New Zealand authorities’ finding of dumping and proceeded to the question of whether the imports in question had caused or threatened to cause injury to the New Zealand transformer industry.

“The Panel noted the view expressed by the New Zealand delegation that the determination of material injury was a matter specifically and expressly reserved, under the terms of Article VI:6 (a), for the decision of the contracting party levying the anti-dumping duty. It also noted the contention that other contracting parties might inquire as to whether such a determination had been made, but that the latter could not be challenged or scrutinized by other contracting parties nor indeed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES themselves. The Panel agreed that the responsibility to make a determination of material injury caused by dumped imports rested in the first place with the authorities of the importing contracting party concerned. However, the Panel could not share the view that such a determination could not be scrutinized if it were challenged by another contracting party. On the contrary, the Panel believed that if a contracting party affected by the determination could make a case that the importation could not in itself have the effect of causing material injury to the industry in question, that contracting party was entitled, under the relevant GATT provisions, in particular Article XXIII, that its representations be given sympathetic consideration and that eventually, if no satisfactory adjustment was effected, it might refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, as had been done by Finland in the present case. To conclude otherwise would give governments complete freedom and unrestricted discretion in deciding anti-dumping cases without any possibility to review the action taken in the GATT. This would lead to an unacceptable situation under the aspect of law and order in international trade relations as governed by the GATT".²⁸¹

3. Articles XII and XVIII:B

The 1950 Report of the Working Party on "The Use of Quantitative Restrictions for Protective and Commercial Purposes"²⁸³ notes that

"It appeared to the Working Party that insofar as these types of practice were in fact carried on for the [protective and commercial] purposes indicated above and were not justified under the provisions of Articles XII to XIV relating to the use of import restrictions to protect the balance of payments or under other provisions of the Agreement specifically permitting the use of import restrictions, they were inconsistent with the provisions of the Agreement, and such misuse of import restrictions might appropriately provide a basis for recourse to the procedures laid down in the Agreement for the settlement of disputes. Moreover, it was not particularly relevant to the Agreement whether such practices were determined unilaterally or in the course of bilateral negotiations".²⁸⁴

In 1952, the United States brought a complaint against Belgian import restrictions which discriminated against imports from the dollar area in order to avoid a Belgian surplus in intra-European trade; a panel was established and was authorized to consult with the International Monetary Fund under Article XV regarding the justification for such restrictions.²⁸⁵

In the "Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII" in 1962, the complaint of Uruguay included, inter alia, balance-of-payments measures maintained by Denmark, Finland, and Japan. In each instance, the Panel Report noted that "the Panel would recall the view of contracting parties, as expressed in the consultations under Article XII:4, that the Government of [Denmark/Finland/Japan] should endeavour to ensure that the quantitative restrictions maintained under Article XII did not have incidental protective effects which would render their removal difficult when [Denmark/Finland/Japan] no longer had need to have recourse to Article XII".²⁸⁶

In its Report to the Council reviewing its work in the period 1970-74, the Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions noted with regard to import surcharges and import deposits applied for balance-of-payments reasons:

"The procedural assimilation of surcharges to import restrictions by the Committee does not, of course, change the rights of contracting parties affected by surcharges. The Committee, in some of its conclusions on surcharges re-affirmed the rights of affected countries by stating that the decision to take note by the Council would in no way preclude recourse to the appropriate provisions of the General Agreement by any contracting party which considered that any benefits accruing to it under Article II of the Agreement in respect of any bound item were nullified or impaired as a consequence of the surcharge".²⁸⁷

Paragraph 1 of the 1979 Declaration on “Trade Measures Taken for Balance-of-Payments Purposes” provides that “The procedures for examination stipulated in Articles XII and XVIII shall apply to all restrictive import measures taken for balance-of-payments purposes. ... The provisions of this paragraph are not intended to modify the substantive provisions of the General Agreement”.²⁸⁸

In the three parallel Panel Reports of 1989 on “Republic of Korea - Restrictions on Imports of Beef” Complaints by Australia²⁸⁹, the United States²⁹⁰ and New Zealand:²⁹¹

“The Panel examined Korea’s contention that its import restrictions ... were justified under the provisions of Article XVIII:B. The Panel noted Korea’s view that the compatibility with the General Agreement of Korea’s import restrictions could not be challenged under Article XXIII because of the existence of special review procedures in paragraphs 12(b) and 12(d) of Article XVIII:B, and the adoption by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of the results of the paragraph 12(b) reviews in the Balance-of-Payments Committee. The Panel decided first to consider whether the consistency of restrictive measures with Article XVIII:B could be examined within the framework of Article XXIII.

“The Panel considered the various arguments of the parties to the dispute concerning past deliberations by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the exclusivity of special review procedures under the General Agreement. However, the Panel was not persuaded that any of these earlier deliberations in the GATT were directly applicable to the present dispute. Moreover, the Panel had a clear mandate to examine Korea’s beef import restrictions under Article XXIII. The Panel’s terms of reference, as agreed by Korea and [Australia/New Zealand/the United States], and approved by the Council, required the Panel, however, to examine the beef import restrictions ‘in the light of the relevant GATT provisions’, which included Article XVIII:B.

“The Panel examined the drafting history of Article XXIII and Article XVIII, and noted that nothing was said about priority or exclusivity of procedures of either Article. The Panel observed that Article XVIII:12(b) provided for regular review of balance-of-payments restrictions by the contracting parties. Article XVIII:12(d) specifically provided for consultations on balance-of-payments restrictions at the request of a contracting party where that party established a prima facie case that the restrictions were inconsistent with the provisions of Article XVIII:B or those of Article XIII, but the Article XVIII:12(d) provision had hitherto not been resorted to. In comparison, the wording of Article XXIII was all-embracing; it provided for dispute settlement procedures applicable to all relevant articles of the General Agreement, including Article XVIII:B in this case. Recourse to Article XXIII procedures could be had by all contracting parties. However, the Panel noted that in GATT practice there were differences with respect to the procedures of Article XXIII and Article XVIII:B. The former provided for the detailed examination of individual measures by a panel of independent experts whereas the latter provided for a general review of the country’s balance-of-payments situation by a committee of government representatives.

“It was the view of the Panel that excluding the possibility of bringing a complaint under Article XXIII against measures for which there was claimed balance-of-payments cover would unnecessarily restrict the application of the General Agreement. This did not preclude, however, resort to special review procedures under Article XVIII:B. Indeed, either procedure, that of Article XVIII:12(d) or Article XXIII, could have been pursued by the parties in this dispute. But as far as this Panel was concerned, the parties had chosen to proceed under Article XXIII”.²⁹²

Footnote 1 to the Uruguay Round Understanding on the Balance-of-Payments Provisions of the GATT 1994, which is incorporated into the GATT 1994, provides that “Nothing in this Understanding is intended to modify the rights and obligations of Members under Articles XII or XVIII:B of GATT 1994. The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of GATT 1994 as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding may be invoked with respect to any matters arising from the application of restrictive import measures taken for balance-of-payments purposes.”

4. Article XV

The Report of the Special Sub-Group on GATT/Fund Relations in the 1954-55 Review Session notes that there was a proposal, which the Sub-Group rejected as unnecessary, to add a note to Article XV:9(a) confirming the right to invoke Article XXIII with respect to exchange controls or exchange restrictions which were in accordance with the IMF Articles of Agreement.²⁹³

5. Article XVIII:C

The Report of the Review Working Party on “Quantitative Restrictions” includes an agreed interpretation of Article XVIII concerning the application of Article XXIII with respect to measures concurred with by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Sections C or D of Article XVIII.²⁹⁴ The text of this interpretation appears at page 662 above.

The Panel Report on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act” noted that “the Panel recognizes that in disputes involving less-developed contracting parties full account should be taken of the special provisions in the General Agreement relating to these countries (such as Article XVIII:C). The Panel did not examine the issues before it in the light of these provisions since the dispute only involved developed contracting parties”.²⁹⁵

6. Article XIX

During the Fifth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, during discussion of Czechoslovakia’s complaint concerning the United States’ Article XIX action on women’s fur felt hats and hat bodies, there was a discussion of whether this complaint should be considered in the framework of Article XIX or Article XXIII. Czechoslovakia declined to accept a proposed declaration that Czechoslovakia would be entitled to take action under Article XIX:3. Instead, a working party was established under Article XXIII to examine whether the United States action had conformed to the requirements of Article XIX:1.²⁹⁶

The Panel Report on “Norway’s Article XIX Action on Certain Textile Products” notes the factual background of this dispute, which involved introduction by Norway of import restrictions on textiles from Hong Kong, authorization of establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2, subsequent invocation of Article XIX:1 by Norway, consultations under (inter alia) Article XIX:2, and a second decision to establish a panel under Article XXIII:2.²⁹⁷ As Hong Kong stated to the Panel that it “was prepared to assume that Norway had the necessary justification for taking this action”, the Panel did not make a finding with respect to the invocation of Article XIX itself.²⁹⁸

During the March 1985 Council meeting, in connection with the discussion of proposed compensatory adjustments under Article XIX:3(a) by the EEC in response to a Canadian Article XIX action, Canada stated that it would seek a panel under Article XXIII to determine whether such compensatory adjustments were consistent with Article XIX:3(a); the issue was raised whether such a panel should be established under Article XIX:3(a) and not Article XXIII.²⁹⁹

7. Article XX

In discussions of the article on exceptions to the commercial policy chapter of the Charter, in the London Session of the Preparatory Committee, it was stated in relation to Article 30 of the draft Charter [XXII and XXIII] that “one of the main objectives of Article 30 was to prevent evasion of the provisions of Chapter IV. If a Member country used the exceptions of sub-paragraph (b) [XX(b)] as a means of protection, Article 30 provided that another Member might make representations to the ITO and so obtain satisfaction. It was almost impossible to draft exceptions which could not be abused, if good faith was lacking. The League of Nations had adopted an Article on the lines of Article 30, precisely because they had been unable to formulate exceptions which would exclude all possibility of abuse”.³⁰⁰

During discussions at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee in 1947, the provisions now contained in Article XXI were removed from the Article on general commercial policy exceptions and relocated in a separate exception (Article 94) at the end of the Charter. In this connection, the question was raised whether the dispute settlement provisions of Article 35 of the New York Draft [XXII/XXIII] would nevertheless apply. It was stated that “It is true that an action taken by a Member under Article 94 could not be challenged in the sense that it could not be claimed that a Member was violating the Charter; but if that action, even though not in conflict with the terms of Article 94, should affect another Member, I should think that that Member would have the right to seek redress of some kind under Article 35 as it now stands. In other words, there is no exception from the application of Article 35 to this or any other Article.”³⁰¹ The records of the Geneva discussions of the Preparatory Committee indicate that the representative of Australia withdrew its reservation on the inclusion of a reference to “fissionable materials” in Article 94 in the light of a statement that the provisions of Article 35 [XXIII] would apply to Article 94 [XXI].³⁰² The addition of a note to clarify that the provisions of paragraph 2 of Article 35 [XXIII:2] applied to Article 94 was rejected as unnecessary.³⁰³

At the Third Session in 1949, Czechoslovakia requested a decision under Article XXIII:2 as to “whether the Government of the United States had failed to carry out its obligations under the Agreement through its administration of the issue of export licences”.³⁰⁴ The complaint was examined and rejected by a roll-call vote of 17 to 1 with 3 abstentions; see further under Article XXI.³⁰⁵

During the discussion in 1982 of trade restrictions affecting Argentina applied for non-economic reasons, the view was expressed “that the provisions of Article XXI were subject to those of Article XXIII:2”. Argentina reserved its rights under Article XXIII in respect of any injury resulting from trade restrictions applied in the context of Article XXI.³⁰⁶ Paragraph 2 of the “Decision Concerning Article XXI of the General Agreement” of 30 November 1982 stipulates that “... when action is taken under Article XXI, all contracting parties affected by such action retain their full rights under the General Agreement”.³⁰⁷

The 1984 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Sugar from Nicaragua” examined the action taken by the US government to reduce the share of the US sugar import quota allocated to Nicaragua and distribute the reduction in Nicaragua’s allocation to El Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica. The Panel Report notes that “The United States stated that it was neither invoking any exceptions under the provisions of the General Agreement nor intending to defend its actions in GATT terms ... the action of the United States did of course affect trade, but was not taken for trade policy reasons.”³⁰⁸

“The Panel noted that the measures taken by the United States concerning sugar imports from Nicaragua were but one aspect of a more general problem. The Panel, in accordance with its terms of reference ... examined those measures solely in the light of the relevant GATT provisions, concerning itself only with the trade issue under dispute.”³⁰⁹

“... The Panel noted that the United States had not invoked any of the exceptions provided for in the General Agreement permitting discriminatory quantitative restrictions contrary to Article XIII. The Panel therefore did not examine whether the reduction in Nicaragua’s quota could be justified under any such provision.”³¹⁰

The follow-up on this Panel report was discussed in the Council meetings of May and July 1984. The United States said that it “had not obstructed Nicaragua’s resort to GATT’s dispute settlement process; it had stated explicitly the conditions under which the issue might be resolved; and it recognized that Nicaragua had certain rights under Article XXIII which it had reserved and could continue to exercise”.³¹¹ Nicaragua stated that it was aware of its rights under Article XXIII.

In Council discussion of Nicaragua’s request for the establishment of a panel on “United States - Trade Measures Affecting Nicaragua”, the representative of the United States stated that “while his delegation recognized that Article XXIII rights were not necessarily lost in all cases in which Article XXI was invoked, a panel had no power to address the validity of, or motivation for, invocation of Article XXI:(b)(3).”³¹² While a panel was established in that dispute, its terms of reference provided that the Panel would examine these measures “in the light of the understanding reached at the Council on 10 October 1985 that the Panel cannot examine or judge the validity or motivation for the invocation of Article XXI:(b)(iii) by the United States”.³¹³

In the 1986 Panel Report on “United States - Trade Measures affecting Nicaragua”, which has not been adopted, the Panel noted the different views of the parties regarding whether the United States’ invocation of Article XXI(b)(iii) was proper, and concluded that this issue was not within its terms of reference. With regard to Nicaragua’s claim of non-violation nullification or impairment of GATT benefits by actions taken under Article XXI, the Panel decided not to propose a ruling.³¹⁴ When the Panel’s report was discussed by the Council in November 1986, the US representative stated that “Nullification or impairment when no GATT violation had been found was a delicate issue, linked to the concept of ‘reasonable expectations’. It was not simply a question of trade damage, since no one doubted the existence of trade damage. Applying the concept of ‘reasonable expectations’ to a case of trade sanctions motivated by national security considerations would be particularly perilous, since at a broader level those security considerations would nevertheless enter into expectations ... the Panel had acted wisely in refraining from a decision that could create a precedent of much wider ramifications for the scope of GATT rights and obligations ...”.³¹⁵ The representative of Nicaragua stated that her delegation could not support adoption of the report, inter alia because it could only be adopted once the Council was in a position to make recommendations.³¹⁶

During discussion in the Twelfth Session concerning the further examination of the Treaty of Rome, the representative of the Interim Committee for the Common Market and Euratom stated that “the Six drew the attention of the CONTRACTING PARTIES ... to the distinction which they made between, on the one hand, the discussions relevant to what they called an investigation as to whether the provisions of the Treaty were consistent with the provisions of paragraphs 5 to 9 of the Agreement and, on the other hand, the discussions which the CONTRACTING PARTIES would like to hold once the investigation had been completed. With regard to the latter discussions ... [the Six] could not accept any special procedures which would imply for them additional obligations which were not applied to the other contracting parties. In regard to the question under consideration, the provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of the General Agreement should be sufficient for the holding of any consultations which the CONTRACTING PARTIES might desire”.³¹⁷

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES noted that the other normal procedures of the General Agreement would also be available to call in question any measures taken by any of the six parties in the application of the provisions of the Rome Treaty, it being open of course to such country to invoke the benefit of Article XXIV insofar as it considered that this Article provided justification for any action which might otherwise be inconsistent with a provision or provisions of the General Agreement”.³¹⁸

When the application of Article XXIV:5(a) to the common customs tariff of the EEC was discussed in the Nineteenth Session in 1961, the Executive Secretary stated that “The conclusion of the CONTRACTING PARTIES when they considered the Rome Treaty clearly indicated that all the procedures of the General Agreement, such as those of Article XXIII, were available to contracting parties to deal with any damage resulting from the application of the Rome Treaty. It was also indicated in the same reference that it was open to the six members of the EEC in any matters brought forward under these procedures to advance, if they wished to do so, their rights under Article XXIV to justify actions which were complained of as causing damage”.³¹⁹

A Canadian request for a panel in 1974, because of lack of agreement in the Article XXIV:6 negotiations upon the accession of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom to the European Communities, led to the establishment of a panel under paragraphs 1(c) and 2 of Article XXIII; however, this panel was not activated because the parties reached an agreement. See the material on relationship with Article XXVIII starting at page 712, and see also the references to the Arbitration on Quality Wheat at page 768.

During the Council discussion in 1982 of the United States’ recourse to Article XXIII with regard to EEC measures on imports of citrus fruit and products under association agreements between the EEC and various countries, many contracting parties stressed the right of a contracting party to seek the establishment of a panel where bilateral settlement of a dispute had failed, and rejected the view that the earlier working party procedures under Article XXIV did preclude proceedings under Article XXIII. The Council agreed to establish a panel under Article XXIII.³²⁰ The 1985 Panel report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, which has not been adopted, includes inter alia the following findings on the relationship between Articles XXIII and XXIV.

“... In the opinion of the Panel, the examination - or re-examination - of Article XXIV agreements was the responsibility of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. In the absence of a decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and without prejudice to any decision CONTRACTING PARTIES might take in the future on such a matter, the Panel was of the view that it would not be appropriate to determine the conformity of an agreement with the requirements of Article XXIV on the basis of a complaint by a contracting party under Article XXIII:1(a). The Panel did not preclude that amongst the procedures available to CONTRACTING PARTIES, a panel could be established to give an advisory opinion on the conformity of an agreement or an interpretation of specific criteria under Article XXIV to assist CONTRACTING PARTIES in making findings or recommendations under Article XXIV:7(b). However, the Panel was of the view that irrespective of the procedure to be followed for this purpose, including a panel, this should be done clearly in the context of Article XXIV and not Article XXIII, as an assessment of all the duties, regulations of commerce and trade coverage as well as the interests and rights of all contracting parties were at stake in such an examination, and not just the interests and rights of one contracting party raising a complaint.

“The Panel considered that the practice, so far followed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, never to use the procedures of Article XXIII:2 to make recommendations or rulings on the GATT-conformity of measures subject to special review procedures was sound. It felt that the purposes these procedures served and the balance of interests underlying them would be lost if contracting parties could invoke the general procedures of Article XXIII:2 for the purpose of requesting decisions by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, on measures to be reviewed under the special procedures. The panel therefore concluded that it should, in the absence of a specific mandate by the Council to the contrary, follow this practice also in the case before it and therefore abstain from an overall examination of the bilateral agreements.”³²¹

“The Panel further noted that in some of the conclusions on agreements, following their examination under Article XXIV:7, the CONTRACTING PARTIES had recalled that procedures for consultations under Article XXII had been accepted and had then noted that ‘the other normal procedures of the General Agreement would also be available to contracting parties to call into question any measures taken’ under the interim agreements (see Rome Treaty: BISD 7S/71; EFTA: BISD 9S/20; LAFTA: BISD 9S/21, and Finnish Association with EFTA: BISD 10S/24). The reference to ‘the other normal procedures of the General Agreement’, after the mention of Article XXII, can only be understood to mean the procedures of Article XXIII. The CONTRACTING PARTIES have established in the above conclusions that this procedure could be used to call into question ‘any measure’ taken by the parties to the agreements; they did not mention the possibility of calling into question the agreements as a whole, under the procedures of Article XXIII. Furthermore, the Panel noted that in the reports of the working parties relating to the respective EEC agreements with Egypt, Lebanon, and Jordan, it was specified that ‘as regards the possibility of consultations with the contracting parties concerning the incidence of the Agreement on their trade interests, which had been mentioned by some members of the Working Party, the spokesman for the European Communities stated that nothing prevented these countries from invoking the relevant provisions of the General Agreement, such as Articles XXII and XXIII’ (BISD 25S/119 para.15, 139 para.16, and 147 para.16).

“... a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the agreements would inevitably have amounted to a judgment on their conformity with Article XXIV. Had it been recognized that an agreement was in conformity with the requirements of Article XXIV, the implementation of this agreement could no longer be considered as nullifying or impairing benefits accruing under the General Agreement. On the other hand, had the agreement been considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as not being in conformity with the said requirements, its implementation would amount to a clear infringement of the provisions of the General Agreement which would constitute prima facie a clear case of nullification or impairment in the sense of Article XXIII:1(a).”³²²

The Panel’s conclusion “that in this particular situation the balance of rights and obligations underlying Articles I and XXIV of the General Agreement had been upset to the disadvantage of the contracting parties not parties to these agreements and that the United States was therefore entitled to offsetting or compensatory adjustment to the extent that the grant of the preferences had caused substantial adverse effects to its actual trade or its trade opportunities”³²³ was disputed by several contracting parties in the GATT Council discussion of the Panel report, which has not been adopted.³²⁴

Paragraph 12 of the Uruguay Round Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994, which is incorporated into the GATT 1994, provides as follows: “The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding may be invoked with respect to any matters arising from the application of those provisions of Article XXIV relating to customs unions, free-trade areas of interim agreements leading to the formation of a customs union or free-trade area.”³²⁶

“13. Each Member is fully responsible under GATT 1994 for the observance of all provisions of GATT 1994, and shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure such observance by regional and local governments and authorities within its territory.

“14. The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of GATT 1994 as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding may be invoked in respect of measures affecting its observance taken by regional or local governments or authorities within the territory of a Member. When the Dispute Settlement Body has ruled that a provision of GATT 1994 has not been observed, the responsible Member shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure its observance. The provisions relating to compensation and suspension of concessions or other obligations apply in cases where it has not been possible to secure such observance.

“15. Each Member undertakes to accord sympathetic consideration to and afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding any representations made by another Member concerning measures affecting the operation of GATT 1994 taken within the territory of the former.”

12. Article XXV:5

The 1952 Report of the Working Party established to consider a waiver requested in respect of the European Coal and Steel Community notes that “the Working Party agreed that the adoption of the Decision would not debar any individual contracting party from having recourse to the provisions of Article XXIII if it considered that any benefit accruing to it under the Agreement was being nullified or impaired”.³²⁷ Similarly, the Decision of 3 March 1955 on the “hard-core waiver” provided that “any concurrence given in accordance with this Decision does not preclude the right of contracting parties affected to have recourse to Article XXIII”³²⁸ and the Decision of the same date granting a waiver to the United States “in connection with import restrictions imposed under Section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (of 1933) as amended” provides that “this Decision shall not preclude the right of affected contracting parties to have recourse to the appropriate provisions of Article XXIII”.³²⁹ The 1955 Report of the Working Party, on “Import Restrictions Imposed by the United States under Section 22 of the U.S. Agricultural Adjustment Act”, which drafted the text of this waiver, notes:

“The purpose of reiterating in paragraph 4 that the obligations of the Agreement are waived without prejudice to the right of the affected contracting parties to have recourse to the appropriate provisions of Article XXIII, is to re-emphasize that point in relation to the imposition of restrictions on additional products and the extension or intensification of existing restrictions. As the first declaration clause indicates, the right of other contracting parties to have recourse to the provisions of Article XXIII is not limited to such cases only, but applies to the Decision as a whole”.³³⁰

On 1 November 1956, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Decision on “Guiding Principles to be Followed in Considering Applications for Waivers from Part I or Other Important Obligations of the Agreement”. These include a provision that “Any decision granting a waiver should include procedures for future consultation on specific action taken under the waiver, and, where appropriate, for arbitration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. ...”.³³¹ Some waiver decisions other than those referred to above also explicitly provide for the possibility of “recourse to the appropriate provisions of Article XXIII”.³³² Other waiver decisions include special consultation and dispute settlement provisions without explicit reference to Article XXIII.³³³ There have been some cases of invocation of such special dispute settlement procedures, for instance in connection with the waiver to the United Kingdom for items traditionally admitted duty-free from countries of the Commonwealth.³³⁴

The Protocol for the Accession of Switzerland³³⁵ includes in paragraphs 4 and 5 reservations with regard to the application of Articles XI and XV:6; paragraph 6 of the Protocol provides that “Switzerland shall enter into consultations pursuant to Articles XXII and XXIII of the General Agreement upon request of any contracting party regarding the reservations mentioned in paragraphs 4 and 5 above ...”. When the text of this Protocol was submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for approval, the Chairman stated that this reservation could be considered analogous to a waiver granted under Article XXV, paragraph 5, “in that such waivers normally contain a clause to the effect that the decision does not preclude the right of affected countries to have recourse to all the provisions of Article XXIII”.³³⁶

A footnote in the 1962 Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” provides:

“It is noted in this connexion that the status of a measure (that is, whether or not it is consistent with GATT) is not to be affected by a waiver decision taken subsequently. In fact, Decisions taken under Article XXV:5 granting waivers from GATT obligations have normally expressly provided for the continued validity of the procedures of Article XXIII in respect of the otherwise ‘waived’ obligations (cf. inter alia, BISD, Third Supplement, pages 35-41; Eighth Supplement, page 22)”.³³⁷

In Council discussion of the 1971 waiver for the Generalized System of Preferences, the “Chairman confirmed that the draft waiver was without prejudice to any article of the General Agreement other than Article I. Rights under Article XXIII of the General Agreement were, therefore, fully preserved”.³³⁸ The waiver decision was adopted “without prejudice to any other Article of the General Agreement”.³³⁹

The 1990 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products Applied Under the 1955 Waiver and Under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions”³⁴⁰ examines the general issue of recourse to Article XXIII in relation to measures taken under a waiver granted under Article XXV:5, in the context of the specific claim of the EEC under Article XXIII concerning measures taken by the United States under the 1955 Waiver Decision referred to above for import restrictions and fees imposed under Section 22 of the US Agricultural Adjustment Act. Concerning the threshold claim of the United States that under the terms of the waiver, recourse to Article XXIII was “limited to ‘affected’ contracting parties and that the EEC is not affected by the measures taken under the Waiver” the Panel found that “the EEC had the right to an investigation of its complaint in accordance with Article XXIII:2 without having to demonstrate that it is ‘affected’ within the meaning of the Waiver”.³⁴¹

“The Panel ... examined the claim by the EEC that the restrictions on imports of sugar-containing products, being inconsistent with Article XI, nullified or impaired benefits accruing to the EEC under the General Agreement, whether or not they meet the terms of the Waiver and that the United States therefore owes compensation. The argument of the EEC on this point essentially is that a waiver does not alter the legal status of a measure; it merely suspends the obligation to implement provisions of the General Agreement. The presumption set forth in the Understanding on Dispute Settlement ... that a measure inconsistent with the General Agreement nullifies or impairs benefits accruing under that Agreement within the meaning of Article XXIII therefore applies independently of whether the measure is covered by a waiver. The EEC considers its position to be supported by a footnote in the panel report on the Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII which states that ‘... the status of a measure (that is, whether or not it is inconsistent with GATT) is not affected by a waiver decision’ (BISD 11S/100). The EEC, referring to a provision in the Understanding on Dispute Settlement which states that compensation should be resorted to only ‘as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the measures which are inconsistent with the General Agreement’ (BISD 26S/216), further claims that it is entitled to compensation as a temporary measure pending the withdrawal of the restrictions on imports of sugar-containing products.

“The Panel examined these arguments in the light of Article XXIII:1(a), which applies to claims of nullification or impairment of benefits accruing under the General Agreement as the result of ‘the failure of another contracting party to carry out its obligations under the General Agreement’. The Panel found that the restrictions on sugar-containing products, though inconsistent with the obligations of the United States under Article XI:1, conform to the terms of a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES waiving that obligation in accordance with Article XXV:5. Since both Article XI:1 and Article XXV:5 form part of the General Agreement, the imposition of the restrictions in conformity with the Waiver cannot constitute a ‘failure of [the United States] to carry out its obligations under this Agreement’ within the meaning of Article XXIII:1(a).

“The Panel then examined the implication of the note in the report on the Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII, according to which ‘... the status of a measure (that is, whether or not it is inconsistent with GATT) is not affected by a waiver decision ...’. The Panel noted that the panel which submitted this report had examined import restrictions imposed by Germany and that Germany had obtained a waiver for the restrictions but nevertheless insisted that they were covered by the existing legislation clause in the protocol by which it acceded to the General Agreement (BISD 8S/31 and 10S/126). Against this background the footnote can be understood to suggest that a decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to waive an obligation for a particular measure does not constitute a ruling by the CONTRACTING PARTIES that the measure is inconsistent with the General Agreement and that, consequently, a contracting party having obtained a waiver for a particular measure is not barred from arguing in proceedings under Article XXIII:2 that the measure would be consistent with the General Agreement even in the absence of the waiver. The footnote therefore does not support the conclusion that a contracting party imposing a measure inconsistent with a particular provision of the General Agreement but covered by the terms of a decision waiving the obligations under that provision in accordance with Article XXV:5 nevertheless fails to carry out its obligations under the General Agreement within the meaning of Article XXIII:1(a). The footnote can in the view of the Panel however be taken as an indication of the fact that a measure inconsistent with a particular provision of the General Agreement remains inconsistent with that particular provision even if the CONTRACTING PARTIES authorized in accordance with Article XXV:5 in exceptional circumstances the maintenance of the measure subject to specified conditions.

“The Panel then examined the EEC claim in the light of Article XXIII:1(b), which may be invoked in respect of the application of ‘any measure, whether or not it conflicts with the provisions of the General Agreement’, and consequently also in respect of any measure covered by a waiver. The CONTRACTING PARTIES confirmed this right when they declared in the Waiver that their decision ‘shall not preclude the right of affected contracting parties to have recourse to the appropriate provisions of Article XXIII’ (BISD 3S/35). The EEC considered that the CONTRACTING PARTIES had, when granting the Waiver, formally noted that measures taken under the Waiver constituted, in certain cases, an impairment of benefits under the General Agreement and that such impairment therefore does not have to be proven by it. The Panel noted that the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in the Waiver decision, declared that ‘they regret that the circumstances make it necessary for the United States to continue to apply import restrictions which, in certain cases, adversely affect the trade of a number of contracting parties, impair concessions granted by the United States and thus impede the attainment of the objectives of the General Agreement’ (BISD 3S/35). This declaration alone does not, in the view of the Panel, give adequate guidance as to the nature of those specific cases where concessions are impaired and, therefore it needs to be determined for each measure taken under the Waiver whether it causes such an impairment. The Panel therefore concluded that the fact that the restrictions found to be inconsistent with Article XI:1 conform to the terms of the Waiver does not prevent the EEC from bringing a complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) of the General Agreement but it is up to the EEC to demonstrate that a nullification or impairment of benefits accruing to it under the General Agreement has resulted from these restrictions".³⁴²

The Understanding in Respect of Waivers of Obligations under the GATT 1994, which is incorporated into the GATT 1994, provides that "Any Member who considers that a benefit accruing to it under GATT 1994 is being nullified or impaired as a result of: (a) the failure of the Member to whom the waiver was granted to observe the terms or conditions of the waiver; (b) the application of a measure consistent with the terms and conditions of the waiver, may invoke the provisions of Article XXIII...".

13. Article XXVIII

In 1974, when Article XXIV:6 negotiations between Canada and the European Communities on the occasion of the accession to the EC of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom did not produce a mutually satisfactory result, Canada referred the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 1(c) and 2 of Article XXIII. Canada requested that a panel of experts be appointed to investigate whether the new Schedules LXXII and LXXIibis maintained a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions between Canada and the European Communities, not less favourable to trade than that provided for in Schedules XL, XLbis, XIX, XXII and LXI.³⁴³ The representative of the European Communities recalled "that the negotiations that had led to this new Schedule covered practically the whole of the customs tariffs in question and a difficult assessment of both a quantitative and qualitative character was therefore called for. The Community could not accept the proposal. The conciliation procedures of the GATT had hitherto mostly been used in cases of violations of the General Agreement; in the present case, a number of factors made this procedure inappropriate. Such an exercise would involve highly sophisticated assessments in complex trade fields where the criteria for reaching judgements were exceedingly imprecise ...".³⁴⁴ At the following Council meeting, the Chairman "concluded that it was the wish of the Council, with the exception of the European Communities, to establish such a panel and that he should, in due course, discuss the question of the panel in consultation with the parties most concerned".³⁴⁵ The panel was established but was not convened as the two parties reached a bilateral agreement.

At the September 1992 Council meeting, Argentina noted its request for recognition of its principal supplying interest under Article XXVIII with respect to EEC concessions on soyabeans and soyacakes. Argentina requested the establishment of a panel to examine this claim so that the CONTRACTING PARTIES could determine this interest under Article XXVIII:1. At the November 1992 Council meeting, the EEC stated that "Argentina's recourse to the dispute settlement mechanism in this case was inappropriate and improper" as in its view this was not a dispute between Argentina and the Community, but a dispute between Argentina and the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The matter was resolved as the EEC recognized Argentina's claim.³⁴⁶

Negotiations under Article XXVIII have also been referred to as a possible resolution in the case of non-violation nullification or impairment: see the reference to Article XXVIII in the findings of the 1992 Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on "Follow-up on the Panel Report 'EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins'", at page 683 above.

C. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE XXIII AND OTHER AGREEMENTS

1. WTO Agreement

On 8 December 1994, the Preparatory Committee, meeting on the occasion of the Implementation Conference, adopted a Decision on “Transitional Co-existence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement”, which provides inter alia:

“1. The contracting parties that are Members of the WTO may, notwithstanding the provisions of the GATT 1947,

“(a) accord to products originating in or destined for a Member of the WTO the benefits to be accorded to such products solely as a result of concessions, commitments or other obligations assumed under the WTO Agreement without according such benefits to products originating in or destined for a contracting party that has not yet become a Member of the WTO; and

“(b) maintain or adopt any measure consistent with the provisions of the WTO Agreement.

“2. The provisions of Article XXIII of the GATT 1947 shall not apply:

“(a) to disputes brought against a contracting party which is a Member of the WTO if the dispute concerns a measure that is identified as a specific measure at issue in a request for the establishment of a panel made in accordance with Article 6 of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes in Annex 2 of the WTO Agreement and the dispute settlement proceedings following that request are being pursued or are completed; and

“(b) in respect of measures covered by paragraph 1 above.”³⁴⁷

See also the material at the end of the chapter on Article VI supra on transitional decisions adopted on 8 December 1994 by the Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices, and the Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures.

2. Tokyo Round Agreements

The dispute settlement provisions of the agreements on non-tariff barriers to trade negotiated in the Tokyo Round are not uniform and do not adopt a consistent approach to the interface between recourse to dispute settlement under these Agreements and recourse to Article XXIII of the General Agreement, nor to the applicability to disputes under these Agreements of procedures applying to disputes under Article XXIII.

Concerning the relationship between rights under these agreements and rights under the General Agreement, the Decision of 28 November 1979 on “Action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the Multilateral Trade Negotiations” provides, inter alia, that

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES note that as a result of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations, a number of Agreements covering certain non-tariff measures and trade in Bovine Meat and Dairy Products have been drawn up. They further note that these Agreements will go into effect as between the parties to these Agreements as from 1 January 1980 or 1 January 1981 as may be the case and for other parties as they accede to these Agreements.

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES also note that existing rights and benefits under the GATT of contracting parties not being parties to these Agreements, including those derived from Article I, are not affected by these Agreements.”³⁴⁸

³⁴⁸L/4905, 26S/201, paras. 2-3.

The 1985 Report of the Working Group on “MTN Agreements and Arrangements” includes the general observation that “Any contracting party which felt that an MTN agreement was implemented in a way contrary to the General Agreement could bring a complaint under Article XXIII of the General Agreement”.³⁴⁹

(1) Use of Article XXIII procedures in disputes under the Tokyo Round agreements regarding obligations under those agreements

Some of the Tokyo Round agreements provide for the application in disputes thereunder mutatis mutandis of the dispute settlement procedures practised under Article XXIII. The Agreement on Import Licensing Procedures contains a general reference to this effect in paragraph 2 of its Article 4:

“Consultations and the settlement of disputes with respect to any matter affecting the operation of this Agreement, shall be subject to the procedures of Articles XXII and XXIII of the GATT.”

The reference to Article XXIII in Article 8:8 of the Agreement on Trade in Civil Aircraft is confined to specific disputes related to that Agreement:

“Signatories agree that, with respect to any dispute related to a matter covered by this Agreement, but not covered by other instruments multilaterally negotiated under the auspices of the GATT, the provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of the General Agreement and the provisions of the Understanding related to Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance shall be applied, mutatis mutandis, by the Signatories and the Committee for the purposes of seeking settlement of such dispute. These procedures shall also be applied for the settlement of any dispute related to a matter covered by this Agreement and by another instrument multilaterally negotiated under the auspices of the GATT, should the parties to the dispute so agree.”

Article 15:7 of the Agreement on Implementation of Article VI provides:

“Further to paragraphs 1-6 the settlement of disputes shall mutatis mutandis be governed by the provisions of the Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance. Panel members shall have relevant experience and be selected from Parties not parties to the dispute.”

(2) Assignment of priority to dispute settlement under the Tokyo Round Agreements relative to recourse to Article XXIII

Certain of the Tokyo Round agreements give priority to recourse to dispute settlement under these agreements when a dispute is between contracting parties to the GATT which are also parties to the agreement in question.

The Agreement on Implementation of Article VII, which relates to customs valuation, provides in Article 20.11:

“If a dispute arises between Parties relating to rights and obligations under this Agreement, Parties should complete the dispute settlement procedures under this Agreement before availing themselves of any rights which they have under the GATT, including invoking Article XXIII thereof.”

At the November 1983 meeting of the Committee on Customs Valuation a statement was made concerning the significance of these references where a party to a Tokyo Round Agreement is not a GATT contracting party: see at page 644 above.

Article 14.23 of the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade also provides that “If disputes arise between Parties relating to rights and obligations of this Agreement, Parties should complete the dispute settlement procedures under this Agreement before availing themselves of any rights which they have under the GATT ...”.

³⁴⁹L/5832/Rev.1, p. 2, para. 4.

Similarly, a footnote to Article 15 of the Agreement on Implementation of Article VI, which relates to anti-dumping practices, provides as follows:

“If disputes arise between Parties relating to rights and obligations under this Agreement, Parties should complete the dispute settlement procedures under this Agreement before availing themselves of any rights which they have under the GATT”.

See the discussion at the October 1988 meeting of the Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices, on the request of Japan for conciliation under Article 15:3 of the Agreement concerning EEC Council Regulation (EEC) No. 1761/87 and its application in particular cases; on the EC's opposition to this request because the Council had already established a panel under Article XXIII on the measures in question; and on the interpretation of this footnote.³⁵⁰

The Agreement on Government Procurement and the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII do not explicitly regulate the relationship between their dispute settlement provisions and those of the General Agreement.

In Council discussion of Brazil's request for a panel on “United States - Denial of Most-favoured-nation Treatment as to Imports of Non-rubber Footwear from Brazil”, in relation to a measure concerning which Brazil had earlier pursued dispute settlement under the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII, the representative of Brazil stated that

“a contracting party could not be prevented from seeking a remedy before the GATT Council because it had also sought protection of its interests under a particular Code ... this would mean accepting that the Code Committees somehow bound the Council and the contracting parties, many of which were not signatories to the Codes. ... To lend further support to his arguments, he quoted from a letter of 11 April 1979 sent by the Chairman of the Tokyo Round sub-group on subsidies and countervailing measures to a certain number of negotiators, as follows: ‘The provisions of the Agreement on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures interpret and apply the provisions of the GATT in Article XXIII as among signatories to the Agreement with respect to disputes concerning subsidies and countervailing measures under the GATT and in this connection will be used by these signatories to resolve any such dispute. However, delegations pointed out that in their view rights and obligations of the contracting parties under Article XXIII of the GATT are not limited thereby.’ He recalled that several other Tokyo Round Codes contained similar provisions under which parties were to complete the dispute settlement procedure under the respective Codes before availing themselves of any rights under the General Agreement”.³⁵¹

(3) Interpretation of Tokyo Round agreements in disputes under the General Agreement

Article 14.23 of the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade further provides that “... Parties recognize that, in any case so referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, any finding, recommendation or ruling pursuant to Article 14, paragraphs 9 to 18 may be taken into account by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, to the extent they relate to matters involving equivalent rights and obligations under the General Agreement. When Parties resort to GATT Article XXIII, a determination under that Article shall be based on GATT provisions only”.

In November 1980, India sought recourse to the procedures of Article XXIII:2 and requested the establishment of a panel to examine the United States' imposition of countervailing duties on industrial fasteners imported from India without applying the injury criterion while extending this benefit to other contracting parties. This action had been taken by the United States after invoking Article 19:9 of the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII (“Subsidies Code”). The representative of the United States stated, inter alia, “that his delegation could not agree to the establishment of a GATT panel to examine those issues that related to interpretation of Code provisions. Nevertheless, it was still prepared to agree to the establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2 but only to deal with problems related to rights and obligations under provisions of the General Agreement”.³⁵² A panel was established under Article XXIII to examine the matter “under the relevant GATT provisions” but the proceedings were terminated as a result of a bilateral settlement.³⁵³

³⁵⁰ ADP/M/24, p. 21-27. The measures were examined in the Panel Report on “EEC - Regulation on Imports of Parts and Components”, L/6657, adopted 16 May 1990, 37S/132.

³⁵¹ C/M/248, p. 15.

In 1987, the United States and India held joint consultations under Article XXIII:1 and Article 4:2 of the Agreement on Import Licensing Procedures, concerning quantitative restrictions on imports of almonds maintained by India and their operation. A panel was established under each agreement, with different panelists for each panel. However, the complaint was withdrawn in June 1988.³⁵⁴

In the panel proceeding on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins” the EEC argued that as between the parties that signed it, the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII created a expectation as to the criteria that would be used to judge a complaint of non-violation nullification or impairment of tariff concessions. The Panel Report adopted in 1990 provides:

“The Panel was established to make findings ‘in the light of the relevant GATT provisions’; it therefore does not have the mandate to propose interpretations of the provisions of the Subsidies Code which the Community invokes to justify its position. However, the following may be noted in this respect. ... The Panel noted that the purpose of the Subsidies Code is, according to its preamble, ‘to apply fully and interpret’ provisions of the General Agreement. In the view of the Panel this speaks in favour of interpreting Article 8:4 in conformity with the decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES rather than, as the Community suggests, revising these decisions in the light of a particular interpretation of a Code accepted by a portion of the contracting parties”.³⁵⁵

See also material starting at page 730 on the scope of the “relevant GATT provisions” interpreted by panels.

4) Relationship between suspension authorized under Article XXIII:2 and measures authorized under Tokyo Round agreements

The Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII provides in Article 18:9:

“The Committee shall consider the panel report as soon as possible and, taking into account the findings contained therein, may make recommendations to the parties with a view to resolving the dispute. If the Committee’s recommendations are not followed within a reasonable period, the Committee may authorize appropriate countermeasures (including withdrawal of GATT concessions or obligations) taking into account the nature and degree of the adverse effect found to exist.”

See also a Secretariat Note of 1983 on “Negotiating History of Article 18:9 and the Treatment of Reports of Working Parties and Panels under Article XXIII of the General Agreement”.³⁵⁶

The Agreement on Implementation of Article VI does not provide for panel recommendations nor for suspension of obligations or concessions: as noted above, Article 15:7 provides that “Further to paragraphs 1-6 the settlement of disputes shall mutatis mutandis be governed by the provisions of the Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance”. On 5 May 1980, the Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices decided, inter alia, that

“... paragraph 7 of Article 15 of the Agreement, is to be interpreted to mean that the measures which may be authorized by the Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices for the purpose of the Agreement may include all such measures as can be authorized under Articles XXII and XXIII of the General Agreement”.³⁵⁷

3. Arrangements on textile trade

In July 1972, Israel referred its complaint relating to the United Kingdom's import quotas on cotton textiles from Israel to the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXIII:2 of the General Agreement. Israel considered the restrictions to be "clearly contrary to the provisions of the Long-Term Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Cotton Textiles and of the General Agreement". The representative of the United Kingdom took the view that "Articles 7:3 and 8(b) of the Long Term Arrangement clearly envisaged that divergence of views should first be referred to the Cotton Textiles Committee" and that "the criteria set forth by the Long-Term Arrangement for the reference of such disputes to the CONTRACTING PARTIES were, therefore, not met".³⁵⁸ In a later Council meeting he also stated that a "Panel would be placed in a difficult position before the matter was examined according to the provisions of Article 7 of the Long-Term Arrangement, since it would have no authority to interpret the Long-Term Arrangement. Considerations like these justified the contention by the United Kingdom that the correct procedure would be to use Article 7 of the Long-Term Arrangement in the first instance. This arrangement would be quicker than setting up a panel since the Cotton Textiles Committee already existed and could be convened in a special session at any time". The representative of the United States "shared the view of the United Kingdom that to refer the matter to the Cotton Textiles Committee would not lead to delays. However, the procedure under the Long-Term Arrangement was not mandatory, contrary to the provisions of Article XXIII. He therefore felt that if Israel insisted on invoking the provisions of Article XXIII the United States delegation should support the setting up of a panel".³⁵⁹ The Council agreed to establish a panel, the report of which was adopted on 5 February 1973.³⁶⁰

The Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles (MFA), which entered into force on 1 January 1974, provides in paragraphs 4 and 5 of Article 11:

"In the absence of any mutually agreed solution in bilateral negotiations or consultations between participating countries provided for in this Arrangement, the Textiles Surveillance Body at the request of either party, and following a thorough and prompt consideration of the matter, shall make recommendations to the parties concerned.

"The Textiles Surveillance Body shall, at the request of any participating country, review promptly any particular measures or arrangements which that country considers to be detrimental to its interests where consultations between it and the participating countries directly concerned have failed to produce a satisfactory solution. It shall make recommendations as appropriate to the participating country or countries concerned".

However, paragraph 6 of Article 1 provides that "The provisions of this Arrangement shall not affect the rights and obligations of the participating countries under the GATT". Accordingly, paragraphs 9 and 10 of Article 11 provide:

"If, following recommendations by the Textiles Surveillance Body, problems continue to exist between the parties, these may be brought before the Textiles Committee or before the GATT Council through the normal GATT procedures".

"Any recommendations and observations of the Textiles Surveillance Body would be taken into account should the matters related to such recommendations and observations subsequently be brought before the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT, particularly under the procedures of Article XXIII of the GATT."³⁶¹

In the December 1982 meeting of the Textiles Committee, the representative of Brazil referred to the 1982 Ministerial Declaration provisions on dispute settlement and stated that "although such a decision was not addressed to the TSB, it had, in his view, a bearing on the work of the TSB and on the way it would operate".³⁶²

Paragraphs 5 and 23 of the Conclusions of the Textiles Committee Adopted on 22 December 1981, which are attached to the Protocol Extending the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles dated 22 December 1981, provide:

“5. It was agreed that any serious problems of textile trade falling within the purview of the Arrangement should be resolved through consultations and negotiations conducted under the relevant provisions thereof.”

“23. It was felt that in order to ensure the proper functioning of the MFA, all participants should refrain from taking measures on textiles covered by the MFA, outside the provisions therein, before exhausting all the relief measures provided in the MFA.”³⁶³

Paragraph 23 was repeated as paragraph 26 of the Conclusions of the Textiles Committee Adopted on 31 July 1986, which are attached to the Protocol Extending the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles dated 31 July 1986.³⁶⁴

The relation between recourse to Article XXIII and dispute settlement carried out by the Textiles Surveillance Body (TSB) under the MFA was discussed at the February 1993 Council meeting in connection with a request for “good offices” by Brazil concerning United States restrictions on wool suits from Brazil. At that time the Director-General noted that “it was the right of any contracting party to request the activation of any dispute settlement procedure, including the procedures relating to the Director-General’s good offices”.³⁶⁵

4. Other multilateral agreements

Article VIII of the International Convention to Facilitate the Importation of Commercial Samples and Advertising Material, which was drawn up at the Sixth and Seventh Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, provides that “... Any dispute which is not settled by negotiation shall be referred to a person or body agreed between the Contracting Parties in dispute, provided that if they are unable to reach agreement, any of these Contracting Parties may request the President of the International Court of Justice to nominate an arbitrator.

“The decision of any person or body appointed under paragraph 2 of this article shall be binding on the Contracting Parties concerned.”³⁶⁶

The 1952 Working Party Report on this Convention notes with respect to Article VIII of the Convention: “The Working Party draws attention to the fact that under the terms of this Article it would be possible, and indeed appropriate, for two contracting parties to refer a dispute between them to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for settlement”.³⁶⁷

5. General international law

In November 1974 the German Federal Government and four German Länder imposed a ban on direct landings of fresh fish by Icelandic trawlers in German ports, after the arrest of a German trawler by Icelandic authorities in disputed waters off the coast of Iceland. The German representative stated that in the light of a previous judgement of the International Court of Justice on the Icelandic fishery zone, and prior attempts at peaceful settlement of the dispute, this limited and temporary measure pending the continuation of negotiations was “a justified counter-measure fully in line with the general rules and principles of international law ... if the ban on direct landings was justified as a counter-measure under generally recognized rules of international law it could not be illegal under the GATT”. The representative of Iceland stated that its extension of its exclusive economic zone was not contrary to international law and “even if the extension of the fishery limits in question was contrary to international law, the measures which had been taken against Iceland constituted a breach of obligations under the General Agreement which was a law in itself".³⁶⁸

6. Referral of matters to the International Court of Justice

During the Third Session in 1949, Cuba requested that the CONTRACTING PARTIES declare reduction of m.f.n. duty rates by the United States to be invalid under GATT unless the prior and express consent of Cuba were obtained, in view of the effect of reduction of m.f.n. duty rates on margins of preference for Cuba guaranteed under a bilateral agreement with the United States. In response to the suggestion of Cuba that the CONTRACTING PARTIES submit the legal aspects in dispute to an international court, the Chairman noted that "he wished to explain that the CONTRACTING PARTIES were not an organization authorized by the United Nations to request advisory opinions from the International Court of Justice. Advisory opinions from the Court may only be sought by the United Nations and by specialized agencies authorized to do so by the Assembly of the United Nations". Following up on this comment, the Chairman later clarified that

"There was nothing in the General Agreement preventing reference to the Court. However, the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly were precluded from presenting a case by the Statute of the Court itself. Article XXV of the Agreement provides for joint action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and [the Chairman] interpreted the words 'with a view to facilitating the operation and furthering the objectives of this Agreement', in paragraph 1, as enabling the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly to interpret the Agreement whenever they saw fit. It was open to any government disagreeing with an interpretation to take the dispute which had given rise to such an interpretation to the International Court, although neither a government nor the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly could take a ruling of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Court".³⁶⁹

In discussions at the Nineteenth Session in 1961 concerning the interpretation of Article XXIV:5(a) in examination of the common external tariff of the EEC, the Executive Secretary said "where there had been a basic disagreement between parties to an international agreement as to the interpretation of one of its basic provisions ... it would be appropriate for the organization to refer the matter to the International Court of Justice for an advisory opinion, but this faculty was only available to certain international organizations, namely those which directly depended on the United Nations. ... the decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on this point ... was that it was within the functions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting jointly under Article XXV, to interpret the Agreement whenever they saw fit. It would be open for any government which disagreed with an interpretation to take the dispute which had given rise to the interpretation to the International Court of Justice, although neither a government nor the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly could take a ruling of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Court".³⁷⁰

7. Bilateral agreements

During the Third Session in 1949, Cuba requested that the CONTRACTING PARTIES declare reduction of m.f.n. duty rates by the United States to be invalid under GATT unless the prior and express consent of Cuba were obtained, in view of the effect that such a reduction of m.f.n. duty rates would have on the margins of preference for Cuba which had been guaranteed under a prior bilateral trade agreement with the United States. The Chairman noted during the discussion that "although the bilateral agreement between the United States and Cuba was outside the purview of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, since it was included in the statement [of Cuba] it could be referred to by delegations but could not be taken into consideration in reaching a decision. Any decision must be reached in the light of the provisions of the General Agreement itself".³⁷¹ A Decision on "Margins of Preference" was adopted on 9 August 1949, providing, inter alia:

"The determination of rights and obligations between governments arising under a bilateral agreement is not a matter within the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES¹...

“This decision does not preclude the possibility of resort to Article XXIII”.³⁷²

This Decision was subject to the following footnote:

“¹This Decision by its terms clearly refers only to the determination of the rights and obligations as between the parties to the bilateral agreement and arising from the agreement. It is, however, within the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to determine whether action under such a bilateral agreement would or would not conflict with the provisions of the General Agreement”.

When this Decision and its footnote were voted on, the question was asked whether such a decision would preclude the jurisdiction of the CONTRACTING PARTIES even in a case in which such a jurisdiction had been foreseen in a bilateral treaty; the Chairman replied that “obviously a bilateral treaty which made reference to the CONTRACTING PARTIES would entitle the CONTRACTING PARTIES to take note of such an agreement”.³⁷³

The 1950 Report of the Working Party on “The Use of Quantitative Restrictions for Protective and Commercial Purposes” notes inter alia that “misuse of import restrictions might appropriately provide a basis for recourse to the procedures laid down in the Agreement for the settlement of disputes. Moreover, it was not particularly relevant to the Agreement whether such practices were determined unilaterally or in the course of bilateral negotiations”.³⁷⁴

In a Note by the Executive Secretary of 1961 on “Questions Relating to Bilateral Agreements, Discrimination and Variable Taxes”³⁷⁵ it was confirmed that a bilateral agreement providing for quotas may entail a violation of Articles XI and/or XIII with regard to other contracting parties.

The 1982 Report of the “Panel on Vitamins” also considered the legal implications of a bilateral Understanding concluded between the EEC and the United States relating to the conversion of tariff rates on Vitamin B12, and concluded “that the United States has not infringed its commitment under the General Agreement or under the ASP Chemical Products Understanding of 2 March 1979”.³⁷⁶

The 1990 Award of the Arbitrator on “Canada/European Communities Article XXVIII Rights”³⁷⁷ dealt with the issue of Canada’s rights with respect to ordinary and quality wheat dating from the Article XXIV:6 negotiations Canada concluded with the Community on 29 March 1962 and the quality and ordinary wheat agreements concluded between the parties on the same day. After the conclusion of negotiations and of two bilateral agreements on wheat under Article XXIV:6 the question of their relationship to GATT arose and in particular “whether Canada may bring a claim based on a bilateral agreement under the multilateral procedures of the GATT”. On this question the arbitrator found that

“In principle a claim based on a bilateral agreement cannot be brought under the multilateral dispute settlement procedures of the GATT. An exception is warranted in this case given the close connection of this particular bilateral agreement with the GATT, the fact that the Agreement is consistent with the objectives of the GATT, and that both parties joined in requesting recourse to the GATT arbitration procedures”.³⁷⁸

The 1991 Report of the Working Party on the “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” records that its members were concerned about possible conflict between the bilateral dispute settlement procedure under this free-trade agreement (FTA) and the multilateral dispute settlement procedure under the GATT. They feared this situation would result in either delays in the adoption of panel reports by CONTRACTING PARTIES or in panel reports not being adopted due to contradictory findings in the FTA’s bilateral dispute settlement process and the General Agreement multilateral process. In the view of one member “such obstruction of the proper functioning of the multilateral dispute settlement process was not in accordance with the obligations of parties under the GATT”.³⁷⁹ The representative of the United States “emphasized that the rights and the obligations of the FTA parties under the GATT remained unchanged”.³⁸⁰

D. PANEL PRACTICE UNDER ARTICLE XXIII

1. Choice between working parties or panels

Choice between a panel under Article XXIII:2 and a working party under Article XXIII:2: Article XXIII:2 does not indicate whether disputes should be handled by a working party or by a panel. In the earliest years of the GATT, disputes were handled by working parties³⁸¹, but the practice of referral to a panel of experts was developed beginning in the 1950s. Paragraph 6(ii) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides:

“In the case of dispute, the CONTRACTING PARTIES have established panels (which have been called by different names) or working parties in order to assist them in examining questions raised under Article XXIII:2. Since 1952, panels have become the usual procedure ...”.

In 1982, during Council discussion of the panel request by the United States in its dispute concerning EEC tariff treatment for imports of citrus fruit and products from certain Mediterranean countries, the representative of Spain requested the establishment of a working party instead of a panel to examine this matter. The representative of the United States responded that “paragraph 10 of the Understanding as well as standing GATT practice gave to the complaining party the choice of requesting either a panel or a working party”. A panel was established in this case.³⁸²

Choice between a panel under Article XXIII:2 and a rule-making working party to interpret the General Agreement: At the May 1973 Council meeting, in response to a panel request by the EEC on “United States Tax Legislation (DISC)”, the United States proposed that with reference to this and the three complaints of the United States on income practices maintained by France, Belgium and the Netherlands, “... the problems of these complaints would be better discussed in a rule-making context, such as a working party ... The working party would be charged with the duty of recommending the type of international rules which contracting parties could adopt to govern their income tax practices with respect to export sales. This would give to all interested contracting parties an opportunity to express their views and participate in the formation of such rules, an opportunity that was not adequate in Article XXIII:2 proceedings ...”. The EEC representative confirmed that the Communities preferred a procedure whereby a body of neutral experts would be set up to examine the question.³⁸³ At the July 1973 Council meeting it was confirmed that the Community and the other parties concerned could not agree to the establishment of a general working party. Four panels were then established in these disputes.³⁸⁴

2. Establishment of working parties and panels

Paragraph 10 of the 1979 Understanding states:

“It is agreed that if a contracting party invoking Article XXIII:2 requests the establishment of a panel to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES to deal with the matter, the CONTRACTING PARTIES would decide on its establishment in accordance with standing practice. It is also agreed that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would similarly decide to establish a working party if were this requested by a contracting party invoking the Article. It is further agreed that such requests would be granted only after the contracting party concerned had had an opportunity to study the complaint and respond to it before the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.

³⁸¹See, e.g., Report of the Working Party on “Brazilian Internal Taxes”, GATT/CP.3/42, adopted on 30 June 1949, II/181. ³⁸⁴C/M/89, p. 10.

In Council discussions in 1974 on the dispute between Canada and the EEC relating to Article XXIV:6 negotiations (see above at page 712), many contracting parties supported the Canadian request for the establishment of a panel under Article XXIII and stated “that every contracting party had the right to seek conciliation in accordance with the relevant procedures of the General Agreement”.³⁸⁵ The Council agreed to establish a panel notwithstanding objections made by the EEC.³⁸⁶

In March 1981 the Council adopted the Director-General’s report on a working party which had discussed with the EEC the possibility of limiting subsidization of sugar, subsequent to the Panel Reports on the complaints of Australia and Brazil on “EC - Refunds of Exports of Sugar”. At that time the Council adopted a compromise text providing for a later review by the Council upon further notification of the EEC sugar regulations.³⁸⁷ At the July 1981 Council meeting, a number of delegations sought to have this review conducted by reconvening the working party. The representative of the United States “sought clarification on the following points: (1) In dealing with matters of a highly technical nature, had it been the practice of the Council to establish working parties? (2) If one or several contracting parties asked for the establishment of a working party, was it in the tradition of GATT to grant such a request? The Chairman replied that it had been the practice of the Council to establish working parties when dealing with matters of a highly technical nature, as well as in some cases with matters of a more general nature. As for the establishment of a working party, he stated that this was closely linked to the issue of the terms of reference for that working party”.³⁸⁸ In the same discussion at the July 1981 Council meeting the representative of Australia, referring to paragraph 10 of the 1979 Understanding, “noted that ... the principle was clear: The CONTRACTING PARTIES would decide to establish a working party if this were requested by a contracting party. This view was supported by past GATT practice”.³⁸⁹ “The representative of India endorsed the Australian view and said that it would set a very bad precedent if the Council decided not to set up a working party when a serious request for doing so had been made. He stressed that this would have a particularly adverse impact for contracting parties not possessing retaliatory power”. At its September 1981 meeting, the Council decided to establish a working party.³⁹⁰

During the Council discussion in 1982 on the United States’ request for a panel to examine its complaint concerning EEC imports of citrus fruits and products, several contracting parties referred to “the general right of a contracting party to a panel ... recognized in the Understanding”³⁹¹ or a “right to the formation of a panel”³⁹² and stated that any contracting party “could request the establishment of a panel and that a panel would be established”.³⁹³ The view was expressed “that a contracting party had the right to a panel upon request, and that it was up to the complaining party to choose whether a panel or working party should be established”.³⁹⁴ The representative of the European Communities “recognized that there were inherent rights for each contracting party to request the establishment of a panel”³⁹⁵ but stated that “the Council could not establish panels automatically on a mechanical basis”. The Council agreed to establish a Panel at its November 1982 meeting.³⁹⁶

In the 1984 Council Discussion on Canada’s request for establishment of a Panel to review the unilateral reduction of the EEC tariff quota on imports of newsprint from Canada, the representative of the European Communities said that “it had been traditional GATT practice since discussion of the legal framework in 1979 not to refuse such a request (for establishment of a panel). The Community would therefore respect the tradition embodied in the 1979 Understanding ...”.³⁹⁷

The 1989 Improvements provide in paragraph F(a) as follows.

“... If the complaining party so requests, a decision to establish a panel or working party shall be taken at the latest at the Council meeting following that at which the request first appeared as an item on the Council’s regular agenda, unless at that meeting the Council decides otherwise.*”

The footnote to this sentence provides: “References to the Council, made in this paragraph as well as in the following paragraphs, are without prejudice to the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, for which the Council is empowered to act in accordance with normal GATT practice (BISD 26S/215).”

At the 8-9 February 1989 Council meeting, in discussion of the request of Brazil for a panel under Article XXIII:2 in respect of “United States - Import Restrictions on Certain Products from Brazil”, “The representative of Australia noted that this matter was before the Council for the second time. He said that some form of precedent had been established whereby, although a panel did not have to be established at the first meeting when it was requested, it was customary to accede to the request at the second meeting. Australia therefore supported Brazil’s request”.³⁹⁸ At the 21 February 1989 Council meeting, in consideration of the same panel request, the US representative stated that “in these circumstances, the United States would not join, but would not block, a consensus to establish a panel”. The representative of Brazil “said that it was incumbent on the Chairman to recognize the overwhelming support for Brazil’s request, and on the Council to agree to establish a panel. There was a clear precedent for such action in the 1974 case involving a dispute between Canada and the European Communities”.³⁹⁹ Brazil had taken note that the United States would not block a consensus on this matter, and asked that a panel be established at the present time. The Chairman said that it was his conclusion, based on the discussion at the 8-9 February Council meeting and at the present meeting, that it was the Council’s wish to establish a panel in this matter. He therefore proposed that the Council take note of the statements, agree to establish a panel and authorize him to draw up the terms of reference and to designate the Chairman and members of the Panel in consultation with the parties concerned”.⁴⁰⁰ The Council so agreed.

In 1991 and 1992 the meaning of paragraph F(a) of the 1989 Improvements was discussed by the Council and in informal consultations. Summing up this debate, the Chairman stated at the March 1992 Council meeting concerning the word “otherwise” in this paragraph that “it had been felt that there would be two circumstances in which the Council’s decision would be otherwise: (a) if there was a consensus not to establish a panel at the second Council meeting, and (b) if there was a consensus to postpone consideration of a request for a panel”.⁴⁰¹

3. Composition of panels

(1) Membership of panels

The 1979 Understanding provides in paragraphs 11, 12 and 14:

“When a panel is set up, the Director-General, after securing the agreement of the contracting parties concerned, should propose the composition of the panel, of three or five members depending on the case, to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for approval. The members of a panel would preferably be governmental. It is understood that citizens of countries whose governments are parties to the dispute would not be members of the panel concerned with that dispute. The panel should be constituted as promptly as possible and normally not later than thirty days from the decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

“The parties to the dispute would respond within a short period of time, i.e., seven working days, to nominations of panel members by the Director-General and would not oppose nominations except for compelling reasons.

³⁹⁸C/M/228, p. 14. Although the 1989 Improvements were formally adopted only in April 1989, a broad consensus on this decision had already been reached at the Midterm Review of the Uruguay Round held at Montreal in December 1988.

“Panel members would serve in their individual capacities and not as government representatives, nor as representatives of any organization. Governments would therefore not give them instructions nor seek to influence them as individuals with regard to matters before a panel. Panel members should be selected with a view to ensuring the independence of the members, a sufficiently diverse background and wide spectrum of experience”.⁴⁰²

Paragraph 6(ii) and (iii) of the Annex to the 1979 Understanding provide:

“.... Members of the panel are usually selected from permanent delegations or, less frequently, from the national administrations in the capitals amongst delegates who participate in GATT activities on a regular basis. The practice has been to appoint a member or members from developing countries when a dispute is between a developing and a developed country.

“Members of panels are expected to act impartially without instructions from their governments. In a few cases, in view of the nature and complexity of the matter, the parties concerned have agreed to designate non-government experts. Nominations are proposed to the parties concerned by the GATT secretariat. The composition of panels (three or five members depending on the case) has been agreed upon by the parties concerned and approved by the GATT Council. It is recognized that a broad spectrum of opinion has been beneficial in difficult cases, but that the number of panel members has sometimes delayed the composition of panels, and therefore the process of dispute settlement”.

See also section F(c) of the 1989 Improvements, paragraph (iii) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision and the section on “Formation of Panels” in the 1984 Decision.

(2) Roster of non-governmental panelists

Paragraph 13 of the 1979 Understanding provides: “In order to facilitate the constitution of panels, the Director-General should maintain an informal indicative list of governmental and non-governmental persons qualified in the fields of trade relations, economic development, and other matters covered by the General Agreement, and who could be available for serving on panels. For this purpose, each contracting party would be invited to indicate at the beginning of every year to the Director-General the name of one or two persons who would be available for such work”.⁴⁰³

Paragraph (iii) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides: “With reference to paragraph 13 of the Understanding, contracting parties will co-operate effectively with the Director-General in making suitably qualified experts available to serve on panels. Where experts are not drawn from Geneva, any expenses, including travel and subsistence allowance, shall be met from the GATT budget”. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the section of the 1984 Decision on “Formation of Panels” provide that “Contracting parties should indicate to the Director-General the names of persons they think qualified to serve as panelists, who are not presently affiliated with national administrations but who have a high degree of knowledge of international trade and experience of the GATT. These names should be used to develop a short roster of non-governmental panelists to be agreed upon by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in consultation with the Director-General. The roster should be as representative as possible of contracting parties.

“The Director-General should continue the practice of proposing panels composed preferably of governmental representatives but may also draw as necessary on persons on the approved roster ...”.

Finally, paragraph F(c)3 of the 1989 Improvements provides regarding the Roster: “The roster of non-governmental panelists shall be expanded and improved. To this end, contracting parties may nominate individuals to serve on panels and shall provide relevant information on their nominee’s knowledge of international trade and of the GATT”.

⁴⁰²The footnote to this paragraph provides: “A statement is included in the Annex describing the current practice with respect to inclusion on panels of persons from developing countries.”

⁴⁰³The footnote to this paragraph provides: “The coverage of travel expenses should be considered within the limits of budgetary possibilities.”

Nominations for the Roster were invited in February 1985 and the Roster was approved by the Council in November 1985. The Roster was extended annually for a one-year period in November 1986 through 1989. The Council decided in November 1990 to extend the Roster provisionally for a further period until the conclusion of the Uruguay Round negotiations on dispute settlement rules and procedures.⁴⁰⁴ In June 1994, the Council agreed to extend the roster until the entry into force of the WTO Agreement, and agreed that the roster would henceforth be issued as an unrestricted document.⁴⁰⁵

At the November 1986 Council meeting in discussion on extension of the Roster, "The Director-General noted that the roster had been constituted on the basis of nominations by contracting parties. The Secretariat remained open to any further nominations to increase the number of available panelists ... if at a certain time the Secretariat thought it useful to call on [qualified experts], even if they were not on the roster, this would be proposed".⁴⁰⁶ Nominations for the Roster have been approved from time to time by the Council. An updated Roster list is circulated periodically by the Secretariat.⁴⁰⁷

(3) Completion of panel composition by the Director-General

Paragraph F(c)5 of the 1989 Improvements provides that "If there is no agreement on the members within twenty days from the establishment of a panel, at the request of either party, the Director-General, in consultation with the Chairman of the Council, shall form the panel by appointing the panelists whom he considers most appropriate, after consulting both parties. The Director-General shall inform the contracting parties of the composition of the panel thus formed no later than ten days from the date he receives such a request". See also paragraph 3 of the section on "Formation of panels" in the 1984 Decision. As of March 1994 the Director-General had received a request under paragraph F(c)5, and completed the panel thereunder, in three instances: the formation in August 1992 of the Panel in the recourse to Article XXIII:2 by the EEC and the Netherlands on behalf of the Netherlands Antilles concerning "United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna Products"⁴⁰⁸, the formation of the Panel in the recourse to Article XXIII:2 by Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela concerning "EEC - Member States' Import Régimes for Bananas"⁴⁰⁹, and the formation of the Panel in the recourse to Article XXIII:2 by Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela concerning "EEC - Import Régime for Bananas".⁴¹⁰

(4) Changes in panel composition

The 1962 Panel Report on the "Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII" notes that "The original membership of the Panel ... comprised seven members in addition to the Chairman. Some of these members, owing to practical difficulties (such as transfer of duty station away from Europe, urgent duties elsewhere, etc.) found themselves unable to participate in the work and requested that their names be withdrawn from the Panel. In two cases, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in accordance with established practice, has appointed a substitute".⁴¹¹

The 1980 Panel Report on "EC - Refunds on Sugar - Complaint by Brazil" notes that as one of the panelists was unable to participate in the work of the Panel until its completion, a substitute was appointed.⁴¹²

In introducing the 1983 Panel Report on "EEC - Subsidies on Export of Pasta Products"⁴¹³ in the Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures, the Panel Chairman recalled that "originally, there were five panelists who together constituted the Panel. One resigned during the course of the examination. With the agreement of the parties, the Panel concluded its work with four panelists".⁴¹⁴

(5) Reconvening of a panel or working party

When, during the July 1981 Council meeting, the question was raised of whether the Working Party on "European Communities - Refunds on Exports of Sugar" could be reconvened to resume its earlier discussions, even though its report⁴¹⁵ had been adopted on 10 March 1981, the Chairman of the Council responded

"that the existence of a working party was related to its terms of reference. In normal GATT practice, when a working party fulfilled its mandate, it ceased to exist when the Council adopted its report. However, when adopting a report, the Council could nevertheless decide to continue the existence of a working party with new or modified terms of reference. He recalled that, in the instance under discussion, the Director-General had been invited to organize discussions in a working party and to submit a report to the Council within a stated time period, which had been accomplished. He said that while the Council might not be able to revive a defunct working party in the strictly legal sense, clearly it could decide to establish a new working party with similar or identical terms of reference".⁴¹⁶

See also discussion of this matter above at page 722.

In 1991, a Panel was established in response to the request of the United States on "Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies". By agreement between the parties, the composition of the Panel was the same as that of a different Panel which in 1988 examined a complaint of the EC relating to practices of Canadian provincial marketing agencies for alcoholic beverages.⁴¹⁷

The 1992 Report of the Members of the Original Oilseeds Panel on "Follow-up on the Panel Report 'EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins'" includes "Introductory Comments" delivered by the Chairman of this body at the first meeting with the parties on 3-4 February 1992, which provide as follows concerning the nature of this body:

"... what I have referred to as 'this body', or as 'the Reconvened Members of the original Oilseeds Panel', is not the original Panel. That is clear since we have a different mandate. On the other hand we have a specific mandate from the CONTRACTING PARTIES and are required to exercise the functions of a Panel in the examination of certain matters and in making findings. As a practical matter it is therefore our intention to conduct these proceedings as a Panel on the basis of the established working practices and procedures that are designed to protect the interests of all parties concerned.

"Accordingly, if for convenience or other reasons we refer to ourselves as the Panel or the Reconvened Panel, I would trust that, in the light of my comments, this is understood to mean the members of the original Oilseeds Panel reconvened for the purposes decided by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the context of the follow-up on the Report of the original Panel".⁴¹⁸

4. Determination of terms of reference

(1) Standard terms of reference

In establishing a Panel, the Council usually authorizes the Chairman of the Council, in consultation with the contracting parties concerned, to decide on appropriate terms of reference and to designate the Panel members. The Chairman then subsequently informs the Council of the terms of reference and of the composition of the Panel, and the Council takes note of this information.⁴¹⁹ The 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice notes in its paragraph 6(ii):

“... The terms of reference are discussed and approved by the Council. Normally, these terms of reference are ‘to examine the matter and to make such findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making the recommendations or rulings provided for in paragraph 2 of Article XXIII’. When a contracting party having recourse to Article XXIII:2 raised questions relating to the suspension of concessions or other obligations, the terms of reference were to examine the matter in accordance with the provisions of Article XXIII:2”.⁴²⁰

The 1982 Ministerial Decision provides in paragraph (v) that:

“The terms of reference of a panel should be formulated so as to permit a clear finding with respect to any contravention of GATT provisions and/or on the question of nullification and impairment of benefits. In terms of paragraph 16 of the Understanding, and after reviewing the facts of the case, the applicability of GATT provisions and the arguments advanced, the panel should come to such a finding”.⁴²¹

During the special meeting of the Council on 19 October 1988 on review of developments in the trading system the Director-General noted that “in almost all recent cases, standard terms of reference had been agreed. He said that if the terms of reference were narrowed, there was the risk of curtailing the complaining party’s right to a full examination of its case. If the terms of reference were expanded, the risk was that panels would be drawn into issues that fell outside the scope of Article XXIII. He therefore welcomed the trend towards using standard terms of reference”.⁴²²

The 1989 Improvements provide, in paragraphs 1 and 2 of section F(b):

“Panels shall have the following terms of reference unless the parties to the dispute agree otherwise within twenty days from the establishment of the panel:

‘To examine, in the light of the relevant GATT provisions, the matter referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES by (name of the contracting party) in document L/... and make such findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making the recommendations or in giving the rulings provided for in Article XXIII:2’.

“In establishing a panel, the Council may authorize its Chairman to draw up the terms of reference of the panel in consultation with the parties subject to the provisions of the preceding paragraph. The terms of reference thus drawn up shall be circulated to all contracting parties. If other than standard terms of reference are agreed upon, any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto in the Council”.

Since entry into effect of the 1989 Improvements, there has been no instance in which the parties to a dispute have agreed to other than standard terms of reference, although there have been instances in which the parties have agreed on understandings regarding the manner in which the panel would carry out its work.⁴²³

See also the material below at pages 734-737 concerning the interpretation by panels of the scope of their terms of reference.

(2) Special terms of reference

In a number of instances before the entry into effect of the 1989 Improvements, the terms of reference of panels were specified in more detail, and were also at times accompanied by understandings on the manner in which the panel would carry out its work. See, for instance, the terms of reference and accompanying understanding in the 1985 Panel Report on “Canada - Measures Affecting the Sale of Gold Coins”⁴²⁴, the terms of reference in the 1986 Panel Report on “United States - Trade Measures Affecting Nicaragua”⁴²⁵, the terms of reference and accompanying understanding recorded in the 1985 Panel Report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean”⁴²⁶ and the understanding recorded in the 1989 Panel Report on “Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Apples and Pears”.⁴²⁷

5. Procedures for multiple complainants

Where two panel proceedings have taken place at or around the same time concerning the same measures, it has occurred that the same panelists have served on both panels. For example, the same panelists served on the 1979 Panel on the complaint brought by Australia on “European Communities - Refunds on Exports of Sugar” and the 1980 Panel in the complaint brought by Brazil (which was initially an interested third party in the Australian case) on “European Communities - Refunds on Exports of Sugar - Complaint by Brazil”.⁴²⁸ Two out of three panelists were the same in the 1979 Panel on “Japanese Measures on Imports of Leather” and the 1980 Panel on “Japan’s Measures on Imports of Leather”.⁴²⁹

At its meeting of 4 February 1987 the Council dealt with requests for panels by Canada and the European Economic Community under Article XXIII:2 concerning the United States’ Superfund taxes on petroleum and petroleum products and on imported chemical derivatives, and a request by Mexico for the good offices of the Director-General under the 1966 Procedures (see page 765 below) concerning solely the Superfund tax on petroleum and petroleum products. The representative of the European Communities said “that a procedural solution should be found so that a single panel could deal with the three complaints, on the understanding that the Panel would look at the specific details of each complaint”. Agreement on terms of reference was subject to the following understanding on the organization of the Panel’s work:

“1. The Panel will organize its examination and present its findings to the Council in such a way that the procedural rights which the parties to the dispute would have enjoyed if separate panels had examined the complaints are in no way impaired. If one of the complainants so requests the panel will submit a separate report on the complaint of that party.

“2. The written submissions by each of the complainants will be made available to the other complainants and each complainant will have the right to be present when one of the other complainants presents its views to the Panel.”⁴³⁰

The Panel submitted a single Report in which the findings on each of the two tax measures in question were presented separately.⁴³¹

At the Council meeting of May 1988, when, in response to requests by Australia and the United States, two panels were established concerning Korea’s beef import restrictions, it was decided that the Council Chairman would consult with the two Panels and with the Secretariat concerning the appropriate administrative arrangements; in consultations among the parties it was agreed that both Panels would have the same composition. A panel on the same import restrictions of Korea was established at the September 1988 Council meeting in response to a request by New Zealand, and it was agreed in consultations that it would have the same composition as well. The applicant party in each proceeding provided a submission as an interested third party in the other two proceedings. The Panels each submitted a separate report with essentially identical findings.⁴³²

At the Council meeting of May 1988, a panel was established concerning EEC restrictions on imports of dessert apples in response to a complaint by Chile. The Panel composition was notified to contracting parties on 5 August 1988. At the September Council meeting a panel was established in response to the complaint of the United States concerning the same restrictions. In October 1988 the members of the first Panel were designated as the members of the second Panel. The Panels submitted separate reports; where the issues argued were the same, the findings were the same.⁴³³

Paragraph F(d) of the 1989 Improvements on "Procedures for Multiple Complainants" provides:

"1. Where more than one contracting party requests the establishment of a panel related to the same matter, a single panel may be established to examine these complaints taking into account the rights of all parties concerned. A single panel should be established to examine such complaints whenever feasible.

"2. The single panel will organize its examination and present its findings to the Council so that the rights which the parties to the dispute would have enjoyed had separate panels examined the complaints are in no way impaired. If one of the parties to the dispute so requests, the panel will submit separate reports on the dispute concerned. The written submissions by each of the complainants will be made available to the other complainants, and each complainant will have the right to be present when one of the other complainants presents its view to the panel.

"3. If more than one panel is established to examine the complaints related to the same matter, to the greatest extent possible the same persons shall serve as panelists on each of the separate panels and the timetable for the panel process in such disputes shall be harmonized."

On 11 March 1992, the EEC requested consultations under Article XXIII:1 on U.S. restrictions on importation of certain tuna products, and on 5 June 1992 the EEC requested a panel. On 3 July the Netherlands, acting on behalf of the Netherlands Antilles, asked for consultations concerning the same restrictions; the consultations were held on 13 July, the following day the Netherlands asked to be joined as co-complainant in a panel to be established pursuant to the EEC's request, and on 14 July the Council agreed to establish a panel with the EEC and the Netherlands as co-complainants.⁴³⁴

The Panel on "EEC-Member States' Import Regimes for Bananas" was established in 1993 in response to a complaint by Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela.⁴³⁵ The Panel on "EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Bananas" was established later in 1993 in response to a complaint by the same five contracting parties.⁴³⁶

At the Forty-ninth Session in January 1994, a panel was established concerning "United States - Measures Affecting the Importation and Internal Sale and Use of Tobacco", pursuant to a complaint under Article XXIII:2 brought by Brazil, Canada, Chile, Colombia, El Salvador, Guatemala, Thailand and Zimbabwe. At its meeting on 22-23 February 1994, the Council agreed that Argentina's complaint concerning the same measures also be examined by the same panel. The terms of reference were amended to read as follows: "To examine, in the light of the relevant provisions of the General Agreement, the matter referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES by Brazil, ⁴³²See paragraph 4 of each of these Panel Reports, all adopted on 7 November 1989: L/6503, 36S/269 (United States); L/6504, 36S/202 (Australia); L/6505, 36S/234 (New Zealand).

6. Scope of panel proceeding

(1) Scope of “the relevant GATT provisions”

The 1979 Understanding notes in paragraph 16 that “The function of panels is to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in discharging their responsibilities under Article XXIII:2.” Paragraph 3 of the Annex thereto further notes that “The function of a panel has normally been to review the facts of a case and the applicability of GATT provisions and to arrive at an objective assessment of these matters”. The standard terms of reference for a panel provided in paragraph F(b) of the 1989 Improvements are “To examine, in the light of the relevant GATT provisions, the matter referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES ... and make such findings as will assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making the recommendations or in giving the rulings provided for in Article XXIII:2”.

(a) Provisions of Protocol of Provisional Application

A number of Panels have interpreted the provisions of the Protocol of Provisional Application. See the chapter on the Protocol in this Index.

(b) Provisions in Protocols of accession

Provisions in Protocols of accession have been interpreted by panels and working parties on various occasions. The 1957 Working Party report on “Import Restrictions of the Federal Republic of Germany”⁴³⁸ examined the obligations of Germany under the Torquay Protocol. The 1962 Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” includes an examination of the claims of three contracting parties that certain measures were permitted under their respective Protocols of Accession.⁴³⁹ Also, during the 1962 examination of residual import restrictions, two contracting parties stated that they considered that certain restrictions they applied to certain agricultural products were covered by their respective Protocols of Accession.⁴⁴⁰ The provisions of the Protocol of Accession of Thailand were interpreted in the 1990 Panel Report on “Thailand - Restrictions on Importation of and Internal Taxes on Cigarettes”.⁴⁴¹

(c) Provisions of decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXV:1 or Article XXV:5

The Decision on “Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Full Participation of Developing Countries” (the “Enabling Clause”), which is a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXV:1, was interpreted as a “relevant GATT provision” by the Panel Report on “United States - Customs User Fee”⁴⁴², the Panel Report on “United States - Denial of Most-favoured-nation Treatment as to Non-rubber Footwear from Brazil”⁴⁴³ and the unadopted 1993 Panel Report on “EEC - Member States’ Import Régimes for Bananas”.⁴⁴⁴

Panels and Working Parties have interpreted the terms of waiver decisions under Article XXV:5 on numerous occasions. See the material above at page 709 on the relationship between Article XXIII and Article XXV:5, and the material under Article XXV:5 in this Index.

(d) Past panel reports

The 1989 Panel Reports on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile” and “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Apples - Complaint by the United States” note in relation to the treatment of an earlier panel report:

“... In considering the facts and arguments relating to Article XI in particular, the Panel took note of the fact that a previous Panel, in 1980, had reported on a complaint involving the same product and the same parties as the present matter and a similar set of GATT issues. ... The Panel construed its terms of reference to mean that it was authorized to examine the matter referred to it by [Chile/the United States] in the light of all relevant provisions of the General Agreement and those related to its interpretation and implementation. It would take into account the 1980 Panel report and the legitimate expectations created by the adoption of this report, but also other GATT practices and Panel reports adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the particular circumstances of this complaint. The Panel, therefore, did not feel it was legally bound by all the details and legal reasoning of the 1980 Panel report”.⁴⁴⁵

(e) Provisions of bilateral agreements

Concerning invocation of bilateral agreements in disputes under Article XXIII, see at page 719.

(f) Provisions of general international law other than the General Agreement; estoppel

The Panel on “United States - Measures Affecting Imports of Softwood Lumber from Canada” examined the United States’ defense that a measure was a countervailing duty undertaking.

“The Panel considered that, for purposes of determining whether the MOU was covered by Article 4:5(a) of the Agreement, the key question was whether in concluding the MOU Canada and the United States had intended to act under this provision. In considering this question, the Panel considered the text of the MOU and actions of the parties subsequent to its conclusion.

“The Panel ... concluded that until April 1992, well after the dispute settlement proceeding before this Panel had been initiated, the United States had not referred to the MOU as an undertaking under Article 4:5(a) of the Agreement in its notifications to the Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures. Furthermore, the United States had not treated the MOU as such an undertaking in the Federal Register notice of 5 January 1987 of the termination of the countervailing duty investigation on imports of softwood lumber from Canada. The United States also had not treated the MOU as such an undertaking in the notices of various actions taken under Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974 with respect to the MOU in December 1986 and January 1987. The Panel further noted that in imposing the interim measures under Section 304 of the Trade Act of 1974, the United States made no reference to the enforcement of a countervailing duty action. The Panel found that these facts were relevant as evidence of the intention of the parties to the MOU with respect to the status of the MOU under the Agreement.

“The Panel noted the argument of the United States that a failure to meet procedural requirements with respect to notification could not defeat substantive rights of a signatory under the Agreement. The Panel did not consider, however, that in the present case it was faced with a situation in which the United States had inadvertently ‘failed’ to notify that on 5 January 1987 it had accepted an undertaking with respect to imports of softwood lumber from Canada; rather, the United States, in consistently refraining from notifying the MOU as an undertaking, had treated the conclusion of the MOU and the termination in January 1987 of the countervailing duty investigation on imports of softwood lumber from Canada as an action which did not constitute a countervailing duty action under the Agreement in the form of a termination of proceedings upon the acceptance of an undertaking. The Panel also recalled in this respect its views expressed in paragraph 19 on the characteristics of undertakings under Article 4:5(a) of the Agreement as alternatives to countervailing duties. The Panel's conclusion regarding the lack of evidence of an intention of Canada and the United States to act under Article 4:5(a) of the Agreement was therefore not based only on the lack of notification of the MOU as an undertaking.”⁴⁴⁶

(g) Elements other than “the relevant GATT provisions”

The Panel on “EEC - Quantitative Restrictions against Imports of Certain Products from Hong Kong” in 1983 considered the argument of the EEC that “the Panel could not ignore that the General Agreement was an international agreement which had to be interpreted on the basis of generally accepted principles and practices of international law. An important principle of international law, namely the ‘law-creating force derived from circumstances’ could not be ignored by the Panel, on the sole ground that no GATT article provided for such a principle”.⁴⁴⁷

“The Panel considered the arguments put forward by the European Community regarding the social and economic conditions which prevailed in the various product categories under examination. The European Community did not claim any corresponding GATT provision in justification for these arguments. The Panel was of the opinion that such matters did not come within the purview of Article XI and XIII of the GATT, and in this instance concluded that they lay outside its consideration

“The Panel considered the argument put forward by the European Community that the principle referred to as ‘the law-creating force derived from circumstances’ could be relevant in the absence of law. It found, however, that in the present case such a situation did not exist, and the matter was to be considered strictly in the light of the provisions of the General Agreement

“The Panel further noted that no GATT justification had been advanced for the quantitative restrictions ... and concluded that the relevant provisions of Article XI were not complied with”.⁴⁴⁸

The 1984 Panel Report on “Japanese Measures on Imports of Leather” refers to arguments made by Japan in justification of quantitative restrictions on imports:

“... The Panel considered that the special historical, cultural and socio-economic circumstances referred to by Japan could not be taken into account by it in this context since its terms of reference were to examine the matter ‘in the light of the relevant GATT provisions’ and these provisions did not provide such a justification for import restrictions. It noted that a panel report adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1983 had, in a similar situation, concluded ‘that [such matters] did not come within the purview of Article XI and XIII of the GATT and ... lay outside its consideration’”.⁴⁵⁰

The 1988 Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products” notes that “As regards the vital role the twelve items under consideration played in Japan’s agriculture and regional economies and their underlying social and political background, the Panel - while aware of their significance in the Japanese context - found that previous panels had established that such circumstances could not provide a justification for import restrictions under the General Agreement”.⁴⁵¹

The 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins” notes that

“The Panel was established to make findings ‘in the light of the relevant GATT provisions’; it therefore does not have the mandate to propose interpretations of the provisions of the Subsidies Code which the Community invokes to justify its position”.⁴⁵²

In the panel proceeding in 1987 on “United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances”, the EC argued that the border tax adjustments involved in the tax on certain imported chemical substances were inconsistent with the Polluter-Pays Principle adopted in the OECD. The Panel report notes that “The mandate of the Panel is to examine the case before it ‘in the light of the relevant GATT provisions’ ... The Panel therefore did not examine the consistency of the revenue provisions of the Superfund Act with the environmental objectives of that Act or with the Polluter-Pays Principle”. The Panel Report also notes the existence of the Group on Environmental Measures and International Trade, and notes that the EC “would thus have a forum available in the GATT in which to pursue the environmental issues which the Panel, because of its limited mandate, could not address”.⁴⁵³ See also the discussion in the unadopted panel report of 1994 on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna” on the extent to which certain environmental and trade treaties other than the General Agreement are relevant in interpreting the General Agreement.⁴⁵⁴

(2) Measures as applied versus measures as such

The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” notes that “The Panel’s terms of reference refer both to the application of Section 337 in general and to its application in the case concerning Certain Aramid Fibre which prompted the European Economic Community to submit its complaint to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. During the course of the Panel’s proceedings, the parties to the Certain Aramid Fibre case reached a settlement ... and thereafter the Community withdrew its request to the Panel to make findings in respect of that case. The Panel therefore limited its examination to Section 337 as such, plus the related Section 337a which the Council clearly intended to be covered by the Panel’s terms of reference since it was the provision applicable in the Certain Aramid Fibre case ...”.⁴⁵⁵

In the 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Regulation on Imports of Parts and Components” the Panel examined an argument of Japan concerning an anti-circumvention provision in EEC anti-dumping legislation:

“Japan considers not only the measures taken under the anti-circumvention provision but also the provision itself to be violating the EEC’s obligations under the General Agreement. Japan therefore asked the Panel to recommend to the CONTRACTING PARTIES that they request the EEC not only to revoke the measures taken under the provision but also to withdraw the provision itself. The Panel therefore examined whether the mere existence of the anti-circumvention provision is inconsistent with the General Agreement. The Panel noted that the anti-circumvention provision does not mandate the imposition of duties or other measures by the EEC Commission and Council; it merely authorizes the Commission and the Council to take certain actions. Under the provisions of the General Agreement which Japan claims to have been violated by the EEC contracting parties are to avoid certain measures; but these provisions do not establish the obligation to avoid legislation under which the executive authorities may possibly impose such measures. ...

“In the light of the above the Panel found that the mere existence of the anti-circumvention provision in the EEC’s anti-dumping Regulation is not inconsistent with the EEC’s obligations under the General Agreement. Although it would, from the perspective of the overall objectives of the General Agreement, be desirable if the EEC were to withdraw the anti-circumvention provision, the EEC would meet its obligations under the General Agreement if it were to cease to apply the provision in respect of contracting parties".⁴⁵⁶

In the 1992 Panel Report on "United States - Denial of Most-favoured-nation Treatment as to Non-rubber Footwear from Brazil," in examining certain legislation of the United States, "... the Panel ... found that these provisions as such, not merely their application in concrete cases, have to be consistent with Article I:1".⁴⁵⁷

(3) Matters not raised in consultations, panel request and/or terms of reference

The 1983 Panel Report on "EEC - Quantitative Restrictions Against Imports of Certain Products from Hong Kong" notes with respect to a difference of opinion between the parties regarding the inclusion of one item among the product categories under examination by the Panel,

"... The Panel considered that just as the terms of reference must be agreed between the parties prior to the commencement of the Panel's examination, similarly the product coverage must be clearly understood and agreed between the parties to the dispute. The Panel considered that to allow the inclusion of an additional product item about which one party had not been formally advised prior to the commencement of proceedings would be to introduce an element of inequity".⁴⁵⁸

The 1984 Panel Report on "United States - Imports of Sugar from Nicaragua" notes that Nicaragua claimed in the panel proceeding that the United States sugar quota system was contrary to Article XI and not covered by the terms of a waiver granted to the US in 1955.

"... The Panel considered that its terms of reference defined the matter before it as 'the measures taken by the United States concerning imports of sugar from Nicaragua', and referred to document L/5492 in which Nicaragua had asked for consultations under Article XXIII:1 on 'the announcement by the United States Government of the modification regarding the allocation of the sugar import quota to Nicaragua'. The Panel concluded, therefore, that the task assigned to it by the Council was to examine not the United States sugar quota system as such but the reduction in the quota allocated to Nicaragua within that system, and that any consideration of the sugar quota system in the light of Article XI fell outside its terms of reference."⁴⁵⁹

The 1984 Panel Report on "Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act" notes in relation to a terms of reference claim by Canada:

"The Panel considered that the examination of undertakings to manufacture goods which would be imported otherwise, as requested by the United States ... was not covered by its terms of reference which only refer to 'the purchase of goods in Canada and/or the export of goods from Canada'. Accordingly the Panel did not examine this question."⁴⁶⁰

The Panel Report on "EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region", which has not been adopted, notes that in this case, the United States challenged the conformity with Article I:1 of tariff preferences on certain citrus products extended under agreements between the EC and certain Mediterranean countries. The US had not made a specific claim of non-violation nullification or impairment in consultations nor in its request for a panel, and stated its claim under Article XXIII:1(b) in response to a question by the Panel.⁴⁶¹

⁴⁶⁰L/5504, adopted on 7 February 1984, 30S/140, 158, para. 5.3.

⁴⁶¹L/5776, dated 7 February 1985 (unadopted), para. 3.33.

“... the Panel proceeded to examine in accordance with Article XXIII:1(b) whether and how a benefit accruing to the US directly or indirectly under Article I:1 had been nullified or impaired as a result of the EEC’s application of tariff preferences on citrus products from certain Mediterranean countries, whether or not these preferences conflicted with the provisions of the General Agreement ... The Panel considered that such an examination was in keeping with its terms of reference to examine the matter in the light of the relevant GATT provisions. The US, in its complaint, had not specified any particular provision of Article XXIII:1, and therefore the matter could also be considered under Article XXIII:1(b) Moreover the US had stated that even if the granting of tariff preferences was consistent with the General Agreement, Article XXIII:1(b) would justify the US complaint that GATT benefits were being nullified or impaired.”⁴⁶²

The 1989 Panel Report examining the complaint of Australia on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Sugar” notes regarding a terms of reference claim by the United States:

“Australia claimed that the reallocation of a portion of Guyana’s sugar quota to Belize, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago in December 1988 was inconsistent with Article XIII:2 of the General Agreement. The United States argued that this matter was not covered by the Panel’s terms of reference because it had arisen after the establishment of the Panel by the Council in September 1988. The Panel considered that it had to interpret its terms of reference not only in the light of the interests of the parties to the dispute, but also in the light of the rights of third contracting parties. The Panel noted that, according to paragraph 15 of the Understanding on Dispute Settlement (BISD 26S/210), ‘any contracting party having a substantial interest in the matter before a Panel, and having notified this to the Council, should have an opportunity to be heard by the panel’. The Panel concluded from this that only those issues which interested third contracting parties could reasonably have expected to be part of the proceedings when the Panel was established by the Council could be considered to be part of the matter referred to the Panel by the Council. The issue raised by Australia involves directly two contracting parties (Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago); it also has implications for other contracting parties. Since the matter raised by Australia had arisen only after the establishment of the Panel by the Council in September 1988, contracting parties had no reason to expect that the reallocation of the sugar quotas among Caribbean countries would be an issue before the Panel. The Panel therefore decided that this reallocation was not part of its mandate. The Panel however recalled in this context that it had found all restrictions imposed by the United States on the importation of sugar under the authority of the Headnote in the Tariff Schedules of the United States to be inconsistent with the General Agreement independent of the quota allocation to specific countries. It also recalled its finding that Article II:1(b) does not permit contracting parties to qualify their obligations under other provisions of the General Agreement and that this could not justify inconsistencies with any article of the General Agreement, including Article XIII.”⁴⁶³

However, a terms of reference claim was rejected in the 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930”:

“The United States suggested that the scope of the complaint was confined to matters of legal procedure, and that the issues raised by the Community concerning in rem general exclusion orders and the possibility of imported products being subject to simultaneous proceedings under Section 337 and in federal district courts are not matters of procedure. However, the Panel noted that its terms of reference refer without limitation to ‘the different rules applicable under Section 337’ to which imported products are subject. Accordingly, it determined that these issues fall within its terms of reference. The term ‘procedure’ is used hereinafter in a broad sense that encompasses these issues.”⁴⁶⁴

A request by Korea that the Panels on the complaints of Australia, New Zealand and the United States on “Korea - Restrictions on Imports of Beef” rule on the admissibility of claims relating to Article XVIII, on the basis that these claims had been improperly brought under Article XXIII and not under Article XVIII:12(d), was rejected: the reasons given were that Korea was a party to the consensus to set up these panels, the terms of reference referred to the matters referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES by Australia and the United States respectively (which included the claims regarding application of Article XVIII), and “The terms of reference do not give the Panels authority to rule on admissibility of the respective claims.”⁴⁶⁵

The 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Denial of Most-favoured-nation Treatment as to Non-rubber Footwear from Brazil” includes an examination and ruling concerning a terms of reference claim.

“The Panel recalled that in their first submissions to the Panel, Brazil and the United States disagreed on the proper scope of the proceeding. In addition to its presentation on Article I:1, Brazil made arguments to the Panel concerning the administration of United States’ countervailing duty laws under Article X and non-violation nullification and impairment under Article XXIII:1(b) and (c). Brazil considered these latter issues to be within the standard terms of reference of the Panel. The United States claimed that these issues had not been raised by Brazil in consultations or in its request for the establishment of a panel. They were therefore outside the terms of reference. The United States did not address these issues on the merits in its submission to the Panel and it requested the Panel to make a ruling on the matter.

“On 18 September 1991, the Panel made the following ruling:

‘Having heard and considered the arguments of Brazil and the United States as to whether or not the Panel should consider presentations on Articles X and XXIII:1(b) and (c), the Panel rules as follows:

‘Article X. The Panel notes that its terms of reference are limited to the matters raised by Brazil in its request for the establishment of this Panel, that is document DS18/2. In its request, Brazil referred to the discrimination in the United States’ countervailing duty laws as applied to Brazil, not however to any discrimination resulting from the administration of United States’ countervailing duty laws. The Panel therefore considers that the matter raised by Brazil in its submission relating to Article X:3(a) is not part of its terms of reference. The Panel would like to emphasize however that it is ready to consider any arguments on the issue of discrimination, taking into account its terms of reference.

‘Article XXIII:1(b) and (c). The Panel further notes that in its request for a Panel, Brazil claimed that the United States had acted inconsistently with the General Agreement. Brazil did not claim that benefits accruing to it under the General Agreement were nullified or impaired as a result of a measure or situation of the type referred to in Article XXIII:1(b) and (c). The Panel therefore considers that the matters raised by Brazil relating to these provisions were not covered by its terms of reference.’⁴⁶⁶

The 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Measures Affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages” includes a ruling by the Panel on preliminary objections by the United States.

- “1. The Panel noted that both parties agreed that the Panel should examine only those practices on which consultations under Article XXIII:1 were held.
- “2. At its meeting on 29-30 May 1991, the Council agreed that the terms of reference of the Panel were to examine ‘the matter referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES by Canada in document DS23/2’ unless the Parties agreed on other terms of reference. The Panel noted that, as set out in the Note by the Chairman of the Council (DS23/4), the parties agreed that the terms of reference of the Panel should include reference to documents DS23/1 to 3. Document DS23/3 considerably narrows the scope of the complaint outlined in DS23/1 and 2.
- “3. The Panel decided to examine all United States measures specified in document DS23/3 and in the submission, dated 23 July 1991, presented by Canada to the GATT Panel.
- “4. Document DS23/3, page 2, declares that Canada ‘reserves the right to raise any new measure which may come into effect during the Panel’s deliberations’. The Panel considers that its terms of reference do not permit it to examine 'any new measure which may come into effect during the Panel's deliberations'.

- "5. The Panel noted that Canada no longer requests the Panel to make a finding on the labelling practices of certain states."⁴⁶⁷

The 1994 Panel Report on "United States - Anti-dumping Duties on Imports of Fresh and Chilled Atlantic Salmon" includes a lengthy discussion of terms of reference claims raised by the United States:

"The Panel considered ... these objections in the light of the provisions of Article 15:2 through 15:7 of the Agreement concerning consultation, conciliation and panel proceedings. The Panel noted that in each paragraph the drafters of the text had chosen to refer to the subject matter of the dispute in identical terms as 'the matter'. Consultations would be requested under Article 15:2 'with a view to reaching a mutually satisfactory resolution of the matter' if a Party considered that such consultations failed to achieve a mutually agreed solution it could refer 'the matter' to the Committee for conciliation; in conciliation, the Committee would meet 'to review the matter'; and if no mutually agreed solution emerged, a panel had to be established 'to examine the matter' if any party to the dispute so requested. This choice of words reflected, in the view of the Panel, the decision to establish a three-step process of settlement of a dispute between Parties concerning a single 'matter' and the individual claims of which a matter is composed, in which panel examination of a matter would be preceded by consultations concerning that same matter and conciliation concerning that same matter.

"The Panel further observed that at the consultation phase, the parties to a dispute were required to consult and thereby provide at least an opportunity for reaching a mutually satisfactory resolution of the matter in dispute. At the conciliation phase, during the Committee's review of the matter, the parties to the dispute were required to go further and 'make their best efforts to reach a mutually satisfactory solution throughout the period of conciliation.' The Panel therefore considered that the Agreement provided that before a party to a dispute could request a panel concerning a matter, the parties to the dispute had to have been given an opportunity to reach a mutually satisfactory resolution of the matter. This condition would not be meaningful unless the matter had been raised in consultations and conciliation.

"The Panel noted that Paragraph 4 of the Understanding regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance, which applies mutatis mutandis to disputes under the Agreement by virtue of Article 15:7 of the Agreement, provided that 'Any requests for consultations should include the reasons therefor'. The Panel however considered that whereas the greatest degree of precision could be expected in the definition of specific claims in a panel request, the complaining Party could not be expected to define its specific claims with the same degree of precision at the time of its request for consultations.

"With reference to conciliation, the Panel further noted the provisions of Footnote 15 to Article 15:3, that 'the Committee may draw Parties' attention to those cases in which, in its view, there are no reasonable bases supporting the allegations made'. The Panel also noted that Article 15:5 referred to a 'detailed examination by the Committee under paragraph 3'. The Panel considered that these provisions implied that the conciliation process envisaged was one which would examine legal claims and their bases and in which each member of the Committee would be able to express its views on these legal issues. Such a process would not be possible unless the request for conciliation identified the matter and the claims composing it. Furthermore, the requirement to make best efforts 'throughout' the conciliation period to reach a mutually satisfactory solution to the matter could not be fulfilled unless the matter had been identified at the start of the conciliation period. The Panel therefore concluded that a matter, including each claim composing that matter, could not be examined by a panel under the Agreement unless that same matter and claim had been referred to the Committee for conciliation in accordance with Article 15:3.

"The Panel then examined the relation between the scope of the matter before it and the terms of reference. The Panel considered that terms of reference served two purposes: definition of the scope of a panel proceeding, and provision of notice to the defending Party and other Parties that could be affected by the panel decision and the outcome of the dispute. The notice function of terms of reference was particularly important in providing the basis for each Party to determine how its interests might be affected and whether it would wish to exercise its right to participate in a dispute as an interested third party. The Panel observed that terms of reference often were standard terms of reference, as in the present dispute, in which the definition of the matter had been supplied by a written statement prepared entirely by the complaining Party. In the light of these considerations, the Panel concluded that a matter, including each claim composing that matter, could not be examined by a panel under the Agreement unless that same matter was within the scope of, and had been identified in, the written statement or statements referred to or contained in its terms of reference. The Panel further observed that Article 15:5 provided that the Committee ‘shall ... establish’ a panel based on such a written statement, and considered that it could therefore not be assumed that the Committee by establishing this Panel with standard terms of reference had decided that the Panel should examine any claim in the written statement, regardless of whether that claim had been the subject of consultations between the parties and conciliation in the Committee.

“In the view of the Panel the foregoing conclusions were particularly appropriate in view of the nature of disputes concerning antidumping actions, relative to the powers accorded to panels by the Agreement. The requirement to engage in consultations and conciliation served an essential purpose in clarifying the facts and arguments in dispute, and framing the dispute concerning the matter in terms which a panel would be best equipped to resolve.

“In light of the foregoing considerations, the Panel was of the view that, for a claim to be properly before the Panel, it had to be within the Panel’s terms of reference and it had to have been identified during prior stages of the dispute settlement process.”⁴⁶⁸

See also the treatment of terms of reference claims in the unadopted panel report of 1993 on “EEC - Member States’ Import Régimes for Bananas”.⁴⁶⁹

In its report adopted in 1994, the panel on “Brazil - Imposition of Provisional and Definitive Countervailing Duties on Milk Powder and Certain Types of Milk from the European Economic Community” notes that while before the panel the EEC based a particular claim inter alia on Article 6.2 of the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII, no reference to that provision appeared in paragraph 13 of SCM/155, the panel request. However, Brazil had not argued that the issues raised by the EEC under this provision were not within the scope of the panel’s terms of reference. The panel did analyze the claim in question in relation to Article 6.2.⁴⁷⁰

(4) Change in the subject matter of a proceeding

(a) Change in measures

The 1962 Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” notes in paragraph 18 that “Whilst the Panel was conducting its consultations, the EEC introduced its Regulation on cereals under the common agricultural policy, replacing the measures included in the original submission by Uruguay. The Panel noted the statement by the delegation of Uruguay that those new measures (which are described in COM.II/134) would have a significant impact on Uruguay’s cereals trade. However, since the measures did not form part of Uruguay’s original submission and since they were under consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES with the active participation of Uruguay, the Panel considered that it would not be appropriate for it to examine the compatibility or otherwise of the measures applied under that Regulation with the General Agreement. The Panel also noted that the measures applying to certain other products might be replaced shortly with the extension of the application of the common agricultural policy, but in the absence of any definite indication in that regard, the Panel deemed it advisable to treat such measures as they now existed".⁴⁷¹

When the same Panel was reconvened in 1964, its terms of reference on that occasion included the examination of "the question of compatibility with the GATT referred to in paragraphs 16-18" of its 1962 Report. The Report of the reconvened Panel notes that the Panel had advised the Uruguayan delegation "that the Panel would now be in a position to examine any specific cases which the Government of Uruguay wished to present, assuming it could also show at that time that bilateral consultations had been tried unsuccessfully".⁴⁷²

The 1989 Panel Report on "United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930" notes that "During the course of the Panel's work, Section 337 was amended by the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988. The Panel's findings are based on Section 337 as it was at the time that the Panel was established by the Council, in October 1987".⁴⁷³

On 14 July 1992 a panel was established in the dispute brought by the EEC and the Netherlands on behalf of the Netherlands Antilles against the United States concerning U.S. restrictions on imports of tuna. In October and November 1992 the U.S. Congress amended the statutes at issue. In October the EEC and the Netherlands requested a pause in the panel procedures, and the chairman then announced a suspension of the panel's work by agreement between the parties until further notice.⁴⁷⁴ On 18 and 25 November 1992, the EEC and the Netherlands respectively proposed supplementary consultations under Article XXIII:1 on the changes to the United States legislation.⁴⁷⁵ The United States agreed to this request, explicitly reserving the question whether these were supplementary consultations or initial consultations under a new dispute settlement proceeding. These consultations took place on 16 December 1992. As a result of the consultations, the parties to the dispute, without prejudice to the rights of any party to the dispute, reached an understanding specifying the U.S. legislative provisions enacted in October 1992 that could be considered in the course of the Panel proceeding. The Panel agreed with the parties that the amendments could be considered by the Panel.⁴⁷⁶

(b) Change in legal basis for measures under the General Agreement

In 1964 the Panel on the "Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII" was reconvened for a second time to consider, inter alia, new measures applied since it was first reconvened in 1963. The Report of the Panel observed that "... most of the measures [cited by Uruguay in its submission] were not new measures applied since its latest [1963] report, but measures which had already been dealt with in its first report [of 1962]. The one case in which measures previously considered might now be regarded as new is that in which the situation of the country applying the restrictions has subsequently altered, as, for example, by disinvocation of Article XII".⁴⁷⁷

The 1980 Panel Report on "Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Textile Products" notes that after Norway imposed unilateral control measures on Hong Kong textiles effective 1 January 1978, the United Kingdom acting on behalf of Hong Kong and Norway held consultations in May 1978. The United Kingdom (for Hong Kong) requested a panel on 1 June 1978 and the Council decided on 6 June 1978 that its Chairman should establish a panel if no solution were reached by 30 June 1978. On 20 July 1978 Norway informed the CONTRACTING PARTIES that it had decided to invoke Article XIX. At the Council meeting of 24 July 1978 the United Kingdom (for Hong Kong) stated that as a result, the legal basis for its complaint had changed and that it might decide to seek consultations with Norway under Article XIX. The Chairman of the Council thereupon stated that he would not take any further steps toward establishment of a Panel. After further consultations, the

United Kingdom (for Hong Kong) on 13 July 1979 again took recourse to Article XXIII:2 and the Council established a Panel on 25 July 1979.⁴⁷⁸

(c) Use of updated information concerning the same measures

The 1978 Panel Report on “Canada - Withdrawal of Tariff Concessions” notes that “The Panel does not consider that full statistics for the applicable base period must be available at the very beginning of the negotiations [under Article XXVIII], provided these data become available later in the negotiations and the latter are not unduly delayed”.⁴⁷⁹ This finding was referred to in the 1980 Panel Report on the complaint brought Australia regarding “EC - Refunds on Exports of Sugar,” in which the Panel examined the issue of share of world export trade in sugar taking into account data for 1978; “... the Panel felt that this year constituted a special case, for the following two reasons: at the time when Australia presented its complaint, the year 1978 had not yet ended and the date for that year were not formally finalized at the time the Panel drew its conclusions; 1978 was also the year in which the International Sugar Agreement, 1977, came into operation. ... Despite these facts the Panel nevertheless felt that the year 1978 should be taken into consideration, be it on the basis of preliminary data noting that this would be in conformity with earlier practice”.⁴⁸⁰ The same approach was taken in the Panel Report of 1980 on “EC - Refunds on Exports of Sugar - Complaint by Brazil,” in which “... the Panel ... noted that Brazil had presented its complaint before final data for 1978 were available and that it would even at the conclusion of its work only have preliminary data for 1979 at its disposal. The Panel nevertheless felt that it was appropriate to include not only 1978, but to the extent possible, also 1979 in its considerations, as the Community export system with respect to sugar had remained the same as in previous years and the effects of the application of the system may have been even more significant than previously. Furthermore, the complaint by Brazil also covered threat of serious prejudice. The Panel therefore felt it appropriate to take into consideration any available information about developments in recent periods and that this would be in conformity with earlier practice”.⁴⁸¹

The three Panel Reports which examined the complaints of Australia, New Zealand and the United States on “Korea - Restrictions on Imports of Beef” indicate that the US and Australian panels were established in April 1988 and the New Zealand panel in September 1988; the panel requests referred to in the terms of reference referred to restrictions imposed under Article XVIII. The Panel’s examination of the application of Article XVIII took into account balance-of-payments data up to the end of 1988 and information provided by the International Monetary Fund on the Korean balance-of-payments situation as of early 1989.⁴⁸²

(5) Claims not raised by the applicant contracting party

In the 1980 Panel Report on “Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Textile Products”

“the Panel noted that ... Hong Kong had limited its formal request to a finding on Norway’s Article XIX action. The Panel at the same time noted and consequently based its decision on the statements by Hong Kong that the latter was prepared to assume that Norway had the necessary justification for taking this action and that a finding concerning the exclusion from the quotas of the EEC and EFTA countries was not necessary”.⁴⁸³

The Chairman of the Panel explained that the “Panel, therefore, had not questioned the validity of the action by Norway under Article XIX; and the Panel’s conclusions did not take into account and were without prejudice to any Article XXIV aspects of the case”.⁴⁸⁴

In the 1984 Panel Report on “Japanese Measures on Imports of Leather”,

“The Panel noted that some of the delegations which had indicated an interest in the matter before it and which had made statements to the Panel had argued that Japan’s import régime on leather contained discriminatory elements and therefore contravened Article XXIII:1 and 2. The Panel did not make a finding on this matter as it had not been raised by the United States and was not, therefore, within its terms of reference ...”.⁴⁸⁵

The 1984 Panel Report on the “United States Manufacturing Clause” includes the following paragraph:

“The Panel noted that the United States had argued that, even if the Panel were to find nullification or impairment of a benefit accruing to the European Communities under the General Agreement, the circumstances would not be serious enough to justify authorization of a suspension of obligations or concessions under Article XXIII:2, since the European Communities had suffered no economic harm. The Panel decided not to examine this argument, because the complaining party, the European Communities, had not requested the Panel to make findings concerning the authorization of suspension of obligations or concessions under Article XXIII”.⁴⁸⁶

In introducing this Panel Report in the Council, the Chairman of the Panel said, inter alia:

“Questions relating to possible compensation, which had been raised in the Council during discussion on setting up the Panel, had not been examined, since the Panel had been established to examine a matter raised by the European Communities, and the Community had asked the Panel during the course of its work not to look into these questions.”⁴⁸⁷

In the 1984 Panel Report on “EEC - Production Aids Granted on Canned Peaches, Canned Pears, Canned Fruit Cocktail and Dried Grapes”, which has not been adopted,

“The Panel noted that the United States had presented its complaint to the Panel as a case of a ‘non-violation’ nullification and impairment. It was the Panel’s understanding that the United States had not contended that the EC production aid system on the four products in question had violated any specific provisions of the General Agreement. The Panel considered that in these circumstances it was not for the Panel to examine the consistency of the EC production aid system with the provisions of the General Agreement. Having noted this the Panel then proceeded to an examination as to whether the EC production aids had nullified or impaired the tariff concessions granted on canned peaches, canned pears, canned fruit cocktail and dried grapes”.⁴⁸⁸

The 1988 Panel Report on “United States Customs User Fee” also notes the argument raised by India which, as an intervening party, “requested the Panel to consider whether the exemption contained in the merchandise processing fee legislation in favour of imports from least developed countries was consistent with the MFN obligations of Article I:1”. The issue was also raised by Australia and Singapore as intervening parties, but not by the applicant parties Canada and the EC, which reserved their rights on the issue and did not object to the Panel dealing with it. The Panel refrained from a formal finding on the issue, in accordance with GATT practice, which it considered sound legal practice, to make findings only on those issues raised by the parties to the dispute.⁴⁸⁹

The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Sugar”, concerning a dispute in which Australia was the applicant party, notes concerning a claim made by the EEC:

“The Panel noted that the EEC, in its submission as an interested third party, argued that the restrictions on the importation of sugar were contrary to the terms of the waiver granted in 1955 by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in connection with import restrictions imposed under Section 22 of the United States

Agricultural Adjustment Act (of 1933) as amended (BISD 3S/32). The Panel noted that the matter referred to the CONTRACTING PARTIES by Australia were restrictions maintained under the authority of the Headnote in the Tariff Schedules of the United States, and not restrictions taken under Section 22 ... Therefore the issue raised by the EEC could not be examined by the Panel. The Panel also recalled in this context that the practice has been for panels to make findings only on those issues raised by the parties to the dispute, not on those raised solely by third parties ...".⁴⁹⁰

The EEC claim referred to by this Panel was then made by the EEC in the dispute recorded in the 1990 Panel Report on "United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-containing Products applied under the 1955 Waiver and under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions".⁴⁹¹

The 1992 Panel on "United States - Denial of Most-favoured-nation Treatment as to Non-rubber Footwear from Brazil" notes that

"... the Panel did not consider it appropriate in the context of this case to address the issues raised in India's third party submission in respect of the non-applicability of the PPA. It was not clear to the Panel how India's arguments respecting the non-applicability of the PPA directly affect Brazil's case before this Panel. GATT practice has been for panels to make findings only on the issues raised by the parties to the dispute.⁴⁹² The Panel believed that this was sound legal practice and should also be followed in the present case. It was of course open to any contracting party which wished to raise this issue to commence consultation and dispute settlement proceedings in its own right under the General Agreement".⁴⁹³

In the 1994 panel report on "United States - Measures Affecting the Importation, Internal Sale and Use of Tobacco", the panel examined a fee charged for inspection of tobacco:

"The Panel ... noted that Article VIII does not apply to taxes within the purview of Article III. The Panel then recalled that no party to the dispute had requested the Panel to examine the consistency of these inspection fees with Article III. Indeed, all parties had argued that the Section 1106(c) inspection fees should be examined in the light of Article VIII. The Panel noted that the consistency of Section 1106(c) could present itself differently under Article III in that the focus of the examination would then be on the inspection fees as internal charges and on whether or not national treatment was accorded in respect of such charges. However, in view of the fact that the parties to the dispute had argued the Section 1106(c) inspection fees in terms of Article VIII, the Panel proceeded to examine this legislative provision under that Article."⁴⁹⁴

Claims advanced by a third party have been considered when the applicant party has explicitly associated them with its claims.⁴⁹⁵

(6) Defences not raised by the respondent contracting party

In the 1983 Panel Report on "EEC - Quantitative Restrictions against Imports of Certain Products from Hong Kong" the Panel "recognized that situations might exist in which the maintenance of quantitative restrictions would be justified under the relevant GATT provisions. It noted, however, that no such provisions had been invoked by the European Community in the matter. It decided that in such circumstances it was not for the Panel to establish whether the present measures would be justified under any GATT provision or provisions".⁴⁹⁶

The 1984 Panel Report on "US - Imports of Sugar from Nicaragua" includes the following findings: "The Panel noted that the United States had not invoked any of the exceptions provided for in the General Agreement permitting discriminatory quantitative restrictions contrary to Article XIII. The Panel therefore did not examine whether the reduction in Nicaragua's quota could be justified under any such provision".⁴⁹⁷

"The Panel noted that Article XI:1 prohibits the use of quantitative restrictions. It recognized that situations might exist in which the maintenance of such restrictions would be justified under the relevant GATT provisions. It noted, however, that Japan had not invoked any provision of the General Agreement to justify the maintenance of the import restrictions on leather. The Panel decided that in such circumstances it was not for it to establish whether the present measures would be justified under any GATT provision or provisions ...".⁴⁹⁸

The 1989 Panel Report on "EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile" notes that in this proceeding, Chile argued that, noting the Commission's responsibility for EEC trade policy, and that member States' import licensing systems were determined by EEC legislation, the Commission should be held responsible for ensuring that its member States administered such licensing in accordance with Article X; the EEC stated that it understood Article XXIV:12 to be an exception and that since the Community had not invoked it in the present case, it saw no grounds for the Panel to examine the EEC's obligations thereunder. The Panel examined the licensing systems in question in relation to Article X and did not examine the applicability of Article XXIV:12.⁴⁹⁹

In the 1990 Panel Report on "EEC - Regulation on Imports of Parts and Components"

"... The Panel ... noted that the United States, as an interested third party, had argued that Article VI of the General Agreement provided to a certain extent a legal basis for measures to prevent what it considered to be circumvention of anti-dumping duties. At one point in the proceedings the EEC stated that, if the Panel were to find that the anti-circumvention duties were justifiable under Article VI, 'it would not disagree' with such an approach ... However, the EEC presented no arguments in support of a justification of its measures under Article VI; on the contrary, in the subsequent proceedings the EEC continued to present various arguments to the effect that measures under Article 13:10 were 'necessary' within the meaning of Article XX(d) because Article VI did not provide a basis for the application of measures to prevent circumvention of anti-dumping duties ... In conformity with the practice of panels not to examine exceptions under the General Agreement which have not been invoked by the contracting party complained against ... and not to examine issues brought only by third parties ... the Panel decided not to examine whether the anti-circumvention duties could be justified under Article VI of the General Agreement".⁵⁰⁰ advised the parties of its conclusions informally but before circulation of the final panel report to the contracting parties.⁵⁰² In such cases panels have usually recommended that proceedings under Article XXIII:2 be terminated. While the panel has submitted a report for adoption including information on the nature of the complaint, the establishment, composition and dates of meetings of the panel, the report does not include legal findings or recommendations and has typically included statements similar to the following.

“Since the terms of reference of the Panel were to make such findings as would assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in making recommendations or rulings in accordance with paragraph 2 of Article XXIII, the Panel draws the attention of the Council to the fact that the parties have arrived at a bilateral solution. Consequently, the Panel considers that it is unnecessary to undertake further investigation of this matter.”⁵⁰³

“The Panel drew the attention of the Council to the fact that agreement between [----] and [----] had been reached and recommends that the proceedings under Article XXIII:2 be terminated.”⁵⁰⁴

The 1982 Panel Report on “United States - Prohibition of Imports of Tuna and Tuna Products from Canada” refers to this practice: “... the Panel noted that according to prevailing GATT practice when a bilateral settlement to a dispute had been found, panels had usually confined their reports to a brief description of the case indicating that a solution had been reached.”⁵⁰⁵ The report in such instances has sometimes also mentioned the withdrawal of the complaint by the applicant contracting party.⁵⁰⁶ If at that point the bilateral solution to the dispute had not yet been implemented, Panel reports have sometimes noted that the disputants have reserved their rights and might re-open the Article XXIII:2 procedure. See, e.g., the 1980 Panel Report on the complaint of Canada regarding “Japan’s Measures on Imports of Leather”:

“The two parties have reserved their rights under the GATT; should the conclusions of the discussions not be put into practice to the satisfaction of either government, it is understood that the matter may be subject to further GATT proceedings. The two parties intend to provide the substance of the agreement reached to other interested delegations upon request.”⁵⁰⁷

Mutually agreed solutions have also occurred after establishment of the panel and before composition of the panel or agreement on terms of reference. In 1988, the complaints of the United States concerning “Japan - Imports of Beef and Citrus Products” and of Australia and New Zealand concerning “Japan - Imports of Beef” were withdrawn in the light of measures agreed by Japan, after panels had been established with respect to the US and Australian complaints, and before the panels were composed.⁵⁰⁸ As the panels had not been composed, they did not submit reports.

In the 1993-94 panel proceeding brought by Chile on EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Apples, Chile requested and was granted a suspension of panel proceedings for bilateral negotiations which resulted in a mutually satisfactory settlement.⁵⁰⁹ In the 1993 panel proceeding on Australia - Imposition of Countervailing ⁵⁰⁹DS39/R; settlement details set out in DS39/4.

Duties on Imports of Glacé Cherries from France and Italy in Application of the Australian Customs Amendment Act 1991, the EEC requested and was granted a suspension of the proceedings, and then withdrew its complaint. The Panel then considered its proceedings to be terminated.⁵¹⁰ The panel proceeding on “United States - Measures Affecting the Export of Pure and Alloy Magnesium from Canada” was also suspended and later withdrawn.⁵¹¹

In the event of partial settlement and withdrawal of some but not all of the claims, the proceeding has continued while taking the partial withdrawal of claims into account. The Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” notes that “The Panel’s terms of reference refer both to the application of Section 337 in general and to its application in the case concerning Certain Aramid Fibre which prompted the European Economic Community to submit its complaint to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. During the course of the Panel’s proceedings, the parties to the Certain Aramid Fibre case [E.I du Pont de Nemours and Company and Akzo N.V.] reached a settlement ... and thereafter the Community withdrew its request to the Panel to make findings in respect of that case. The Panel therefore limited its examination to Section 337 as such, plus the related Section 337a which the Council clearly intended to be covered by the Panel’s term of reference since it was the provision applicable in the Certain Aramid Fibre case”.⁵¹²

Mutually agreed solutions have also occurred after circulation of the panel report but before its adoption. See the discussion below at page 760 of the treatment of the 1991 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna”.

See also the material above starting at page 649 concerning measures no longer in effect, and the material at pages 738-740 concerning changes in the subject matter of a dispute.

(b) Transparency concerning settlements

Paragraphs 17 and 19 of the 1979 Understanding provide:

“... Where a bilateral settlement of the matter has been found, the report of the panel may be confined to a brief description of the case and to reporting that a solution has been reached.

“If a mutually satisfactory solution is developed by the parties to a dispute before a panel, any contracting party with an interest in the matter has a right to enquire about and be given appropriate information about that solution in so far as it relates to trade matters”.

See also similar statements in paragraphs 6(v) and (vi) in the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice.

The 1989 Improvements provide in paragraph B that “Mutually agreed solutions to matters formally raised under GATT Articles XXII and XXIII, as well as arbitration awards within GATT, must be notified to the Council where any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto”.

7. Panel procedure

Paragraphs 6(iv), (vi) and (vii) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provide as follows:

“(iv) Panels set up their own working procedures. The practice for the panels has been to hold two or three formal meetings with the parties concerned. The panel invited the parties to present their views either in writing and/or orally in the presence of each other. The panel can question both parties on any matter which it considers relevant to the dispute. ... Written memoranda submitted to the panel have been considered confidential, but are made available to the parties to the dispute.

⁵¹²L/6439, adopted on 7 November 1989, 36S/345, 382-383, para. 5.1; see also ibid. at 36S/353-354, para. 2.9 on the private party settlement.

- “(vi) The reports of panels have been drafted in the absence of the parties in the light of the information and the statements made.
- “(vii) To encourage development of mutually satisfactory solutions between the parties and with a view to obtaining their comments, each panel has normally first submitted the descriptive part of its report to the parties concerned, and also their conclusions, or an outline thereof, a reasonable period of time before they have been circulated to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.”

Paragraphs F(f)1-2 of the 1989 Improvements provide that

“1. Panel procedures should provide sufficient flexibility so as to ensure high-quality panel reports, while not unduly delaying the panel process.

“2. Panels shall follow the Suggested Working Procedures found in the July 1985 note of the Office of Legal Affairs unless the members of the panel agree otherwise after consulting the parties to the dispute ...”.

(1) Time deadlines for panels

The 1966 Procedures provide for complaints by a less-developed contracting party against a developed contracting party that upon referral to a panel after completion of good offices, “the panel shall, within a period of sixty days from the date the matter was referred to it, submit its findings and recommendations to the CONTRACTING PARTIES or to the Council, for consideration and decision”. See the discussion of this deadline at the March 1993 Council meeting.⁵¹³

See also paragraph 20 of the 1979 Understanding and paragraph 6(ix) of its Annex on customary practice, paragraph (vi) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision, and the section on “Completion of panel work” in the 1984 Decision. Paragraphs F(f)(2) through (6) of the 1989 Improvements provide that

“2. ... After consulting the parties, the panel members shall, as soon as practicable and whenever possible within one week after the composition and terms of reference of the panel have been agreed upon, fix the timetable for the panel process at least until its first substantive meeting.

“3. In determining the timetable for the panel process, the panel shall provide sufficient time for the parties to the dispute to prepare their submissions.

“4. Each party to the dispute shall deposit its written submissions with the Secretariat for immediate transmission to the panel and to the other party or parties to the dispute. The complaining party shall submit its first submission in advance of the responding party's first submission unless the panel decides, in fixing the timetable referred to in the second paragraph of this section and after consultations with the parties to the dispute, that the parties should submit their first submissions simultaneously. When there are sequential arrangements for the deposit of first submissions, the panel shall establish a firm time period for receipt of the responding party's submission. Any subsequent written submissions shall be submitted simultaneously.

“5. In order to make the procedures more efficient, the period in which the panel shall conduct its examination, from the time the composition and terms of reference of the panel have been agreed upon to the time when the final report is provided to the parties to the dispute, shall, as a general rule, not exceed six months ...

“6. When the panel considers that it cannot provide its report within six months, or within three months in cases of urgency, it shall inform the Council in writing of the reasons for the delay together with an estimate of the period within which it will submit its report. In no case should the period from the establishment of the panel to the submission of the report to the contracting parties exceed nine months”.

⁵¹³C/M/262, p. 18-23.

As of March 1994 there had been two instances in which the Council was informed of reasons for delay under this provision.⁵¹⁴

(2) Urgent cases

The 1962 Panel Report on “Exports of Potatoes to Canada”, adopted on 16 November 1962, examined the introduction on 16 October 1962 of “values for duty” (and therefore an additional charge) under the Canadian Customs Act, on imports of potatoes into Western Canada. Similar measures had been taken once before in the previous year and withdrawn at the end of the marketing season.

“The Canadian delegation stated that a representation had been received from the United States regarding the value for potatoes only a few days before the session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. ... The Panel noted that the United States Government had made representations to the Canadian Government when action in respect of potatoes had been taken for the first time in 1961. It noted further that when action had been taken on 16 October 1962, i.e. in the week preceding the present session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the United States Government had again made representations to the Canadian Government, but at the same time had referred the question to the CONTRACTING PARTIES at very short notice. The Panel noted the United States’ explanation that, because of the seasonal character of such action, the present session offered the only opportunity for consideration of the matter by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.”⁵¹⁵

The Panel found that the measure was inconsistent with Article II; the report notes that the Panel did not consider the question of whether the circumstances were “serious enough”, in view of the circumstances and because trade statistics were not available.⁵¹⁶

Paragraph 20 of the 1979 Understanding provides on this subject: “... In cases of urgency the panel would be called upon to deliver its findings within a period normally of three months from the time the panel was established”.

In 1985, in connection with the United States request for establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2 on leather footwear to apply the findings of the 1984 Report of the “Panel on Japanese Measures on Imports of Leather”, the United States also requested that the panel proceeding be conducted on an expedited basis as provided under paragraph 20 of the 1979 Understanding, and that, in the light of the narrow scope of such a panel’s inquiry, the panel deliver its findings not later than three months from the date of its establishment.⁵¹⁷

The 1989 Improvements provide, in paragraph F(f)(5), that “In cases of urgency, including those relating to perishable goods, the panel shall aim to provide its report to the parties within three months”.

Requests have been made under these “urgency” provisions in connection with the 1993 panel request by Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, El Salvador and Venezuela in their dispute concerning the EEC import régime for bananas, a 1993 request by Chile for consultations on EEC restrictions on imports of apples, and a 1994 request by Argentina for Article XXIII:1 consultations on EEC countervailing charges on lemons.⁵¹⁸

(3) Confidentiality and privacy of proceedings

Paragraph 6(viii) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides that “... The opinions expressed by the panel members on the matter are anonymous and the panel deliberations are secret.” Paragraph (i) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides, with reference to the good offices procedures provided therein, that “... Conciliation proceedings, and in particular positions taken by the parties to the dispute during consultations, shall be confidential ...”.

(4) Role of Secretariat

Paragraph 6(iv) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice notes that “Panels may seek advice or assistance from the secretariat in its capacity as guardian of the General Agreement, especially on historical or procedural aspects. The secretariat provides the secretary and technical services for panels”. Paragraph (iv) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides that “The secretariat of GATT has the responsibility of assisting the panel, especially on the legal, historical and procedural aspects of the matters dealt with”. See also the reference in paragraph H.1 of the 1989 Improvements that “the Secretariat assists contracting parties in respect of dispute settlement at their request” and to provision of technical assistance to developing contracting parties “in a manner ensuring the continued impartiality of the Secretariat”.

8. Sources and treatment of information

(1) Right of panel to seek information

Paragraph 15 of the 1979 Understanding provides: “Each panel should have the right to seek information and technical advice from any individual or body which it deems appropriate. However, before a panel seeks such information or advice from any individual or body within the jurisdiction of a State it shall inform the government of that State. Any contracting party should respond promptly and fully to any request by a panel for such information as the panel considers necessary and appropriate ...”. Paragraph 6(iv) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice notes:

“... The practice for the panels has been to hold two or three formal meetings with the parties concerned. The panel invited the parties to present their views either in writing and/or orally in the presence of each other. The panel can question both parties on any matter which it considers relevant to the dispute. ... Panels often consult with and seek information from any relevant source they deem appropriate and they sometimes consult experts to obtain their technical opinion on certain aspects of the matter”.

(2) Use of experts

The “Good Offices Report by the Personal Representative of the Director-General on the Dispute between the EC and Japan Concerning Certain Pricing and Trading Practices for Copper in Japan” of 1988 notes that an independent expert on the copper market was hired in this dispute in accordance with an understanding between the two parties. “As a first step the Director-General was asked to establish the factual situation. To this end an independent expert, Mr. Martin Thompson, was retained by the parties. His study was completed in October 1988, and was submitted to and commented on by the parties. It has been of great help in preparing this report”.⁵¹⁹ The Personal Representative also met with the parties.

The 1990 Panel Report on “Thailand - Restrictions on Importation of and Internal Taxes on Cigarettes” notes that on the basis of a Memorandum of Understanding between the parties and in pursuance of Thailand’s request, the Panel asked the World Health Organization (WHO) to present its conclusions on technical aspects of the case, such as the health effects of cigarette use and consumption, and on related issues for which the WHO was competent; the parties to the dispute also commented on the submission of the WHO.⁵²⁰

(3) Presumptions and burden of proof

(a) Burden of production of information regarding consistency with the General Agreement

The Panel Report on “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” notes as follows concerning the procedures used by that Panel:

“In a number of cases, the contracting party concerned maintained (a) that certain measures applied by it were consistent with the provisions of GATT, or (b) that the measures, while not consistent with the provisions of the General Agreement, were permitted under the terms of the Protocol of Provisional Application, the Annecy Protocol or the Torquay Protocol on account of their being applied pursuant to ‘existing legislation’. In most of these cases, the contention was not questioned by the Uruguayan delegation. For practical purposes, the Panel has taken the position that in cases where the contention has not been challenged and is not contradicted by the available records of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, it would be beyond its competence to examine whether the contention was or was not justified”.⁵²¹

The 1992 Panel Report on “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies” examined the facts concerning the conditions imposed by each of these agencies (“liquor boards”) for listing imported beer for sale - facts which were contested between the parties.

“The Panel noted that the United States had claimed that the listing and delisting practices which had been found to be inconsistent with Canada’s obligations under Article XI of the General Agreement by the Panel that had examined these practices in 1988 at the request of the EEC, had not been fully eliminated by Canada ... Canada claimed that this issue had been fully settled by its 1988 agreement with the EC, which was being applied on a most-favoured-nation basis, and that all the provincial liquor boards acted in accordance with the principles of non-discrimination set out in this agreement

“The Panel noted that, with the exception of the listing and delisting practices in Ontario, the parties did not agree on the listing and delisting practices actually pursued by the liquor boards. The Panel also noted that the United States had, on 17 July 1991, specifically requested the Panel not to prolong its proceedings. The Panel therefore decided not to schedule another meeting with the parties to permit the United States to submit further evidence on this issue. For these reasons, the Panel had to conclude that, with the exception of the listing and delisting practices in Ontario, the United States had not substantiated its claim that Canada still maintained listing and delisting practices inconsistent with Article XI of the General Agreement”.⁵²²

See also the finding in the 1994 Panel Report on “United States - Measures Affecting the Importation, Internal Sale and Use of Tobacco” that “the evidence did not support the complainants’ claim that the DMA’s penalty provisions were separate taxes or charges within the meaning of Article III:2.”⁵²³

(b) Presumption of prima facie nullification or impairment

See the material starting at page 655 concerning prima facie nullification or impairment.

In respect of certain trade measures such as import permit requirements, mixing regulations, quotas and maximum or minimum price systems, the Panel in the Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII considered “that insofar as it has not been established that these measures are being applied consistently with the provisions of the General Agreement or are permitted by the terms of the protocol under which [name of contracting party concerned] applies the GATT, it has to proceed on the assumption that their maintenance can nullify or impair the benefits accruing to Uruguay under the Agreement”.⁵²⁴

(c) Burden of proof regarding exceptions and narrow interpretation of exceptions

Statements have been made in panel and working party reports regarding the burden of coming forward with evidence that the requirements of a claimed exception have been met, in relation to Articles VI, XI:2(c) and XX and the Protocol of Provisional Application. For more context, see references to the cases cited in this Index under the provision concerned.

Article VI: The 1955 Panel Report on “Swedish Anti-Dumping Duties” examined a Swedish Decree imposing a basic price scheme under which an anti-dumping duty was levied on imports of nylon stockings whenever the invoice price was lower than a minimum price fixed by the Swedish Government. As regards the burden of proof of facts justifying the imposition of anti-dumping duties, the Panel Report notes that “... it was clear from the wording of Article VI that no anti-dumping duties should be levied unless certain facts had been established. As this represented an obligation of the contracting party imposing such duties, it would be reasonable to expect that that contracting party should establish the existence of these facts when its action is challenged”.⁵²⁵ The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Countervailing Duties on Fresh, Chilled and Frozen Pork from Canada” notes that “the Panel found that Article VI:3, as an exception to basic principles of the General Agreement, had to be interpreted narrowly and that it was up to the United States, as the party invoking the exception, to demonstrate that it had met the requirements of Article VI:3”.⁵²⁶

Article XI:2(c): The 1988 Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products” notes that the Panel “considered ... that the burden of providing the evidence that all the requirements of Article XI:2(c)(i), including the proportionality requirement, had been met must remain fully with the contracting party invoking that provision”.⁵²⁷ See also a similar reference in the 1989 Panel Report on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile”.⁵²⁸ In the 1989 Panel Report on “Canada - Import Restrictions on Ice Cream and Yoghurt”.⁵²⁹

“The Panel recalled that it had previously been concluded that a contracting party invoking an exception to the General Agreement bore the burden of proving that it had met all of the conditions of that exception.”⁵³⁰ It also noted, as had previous panels, that exceptions were to be interpreted narrowly and considered that this argued against flexible interpretation of Article XI:2(c)(i).⁵³¹ The Panel was aware that the requirements of Article XI:2(c)(i) for invoking an exception to the general prohibition on quantitative restrictions made this provision extremely difficult to comply with in practice.⁵³² However, any change in the burden of proof could have consequences equivalent to amending Article XI, seriously affecting the balance of tariff concessions negotiated among contracting parties, and was therefore outside the scope of the Panel’s mandate”.⁵³³

Article XX: The 1984 Panel Report on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act” notes that “Since Article XX(d) is an exception to the General Agreement it is up to Canada, as the party invoking the exception, to demonstrate that the purchase undertakings are necessary to secure compliance with the Foreign Investment Review Act”.⁵³⁴ The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” provides that “... it is up to the contracting party seeking to justify measures under Article XX(d) to demonstrate that those measures are ‘necessary’ within the meaning of that provision”.⁵³⁵ The 1991 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna”, which has not been adopted, notes that “... previous panels had established that Article XX is a limited and conditional exception from obligations under other provisions of the General Agreement, and not a positive rule establishing obligations in itself.”⁵³⁶ Therefore, the practice of panels has been to interpret Article XX narrowly, to place the burden on the party invoking Article XX to justify its invocation,⁵³⁷ and not to examine Article XX exceptions unless invoked.⁵³⁸ In the 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Measures Affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages”, “... The Panel ... noted the practice of the CONTRACTING PARTIES of interpreting these Article XX exceptions narrowly, placing the burden on the party invoking an exception to justify its use.”⁵³⁹

Protocol of Provisional Application: The 1957 Working Party Report on “Import Restrictions of the Federal Republic of Germany” notes the view of a number of delegations that “Should the Federal Government seek to maintain its claim that the Marketing Laws in fact require the maintenance of restrictions inconsistent with GATT provisions, the German delegation should produce the text of the Laws and particulars of the parliamentary discussions and explanatory material relating to the legislation in question to bear out its contention.”⁵⁴⁰ The 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Measures affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages”, in examining a US claim under the “existing legislation” clause of the Protocol of Provisional Application, “noted that the United States, as the party invoking the PPA, has the burden of demonstrating its applicability in the instant case.”⁵⁴¹

Reference to interpretation of exceptions was also made in the 1992 Panel Report under the Agreement on Government Procurement concerning “Norway - Procurement of Toll Collection Equipment for the City of Trondheim” which provides regarding the provisions on single tendering in Article V:16: “The Panel agreed with the view that Article V:16 must be regarded as an exceptions provision containing, as made clear in the last sentence of Article V:1, a finite list of the circumstances under which Parties could deviate from the basic rules requiring open or selective tendering. Since Article V:16(e) was an exceptions provision, its scope had to be interpreted narrowly and it would be up to Norway, as the Party invoking the provision, to demonstrate the conformity of its actions with the provision.”⁵⁴²

(d) Arguments in the alternative

The 1991 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna”, which has not been adopted, includes the following finding regarding the presentation of arguments to a panel concerning both the positive prescriptions of the General Agreement and the exceptions in Article XX:

“The Panel noted that the United States had argued that its direct embargo under the MMPA could be justified under Article XX(b) or Article XX(g), and that Mexico had argued that a contracting party could not simultaneously argue that a measure is compatible with the general rules of the General Agreement and invoke Article XX for that measure. ... the Panel considered that a party to a dispute could argue in the alternative that Article XX might apply, without this argument constituting ipso facto an admission that the measures in question would otherwise be inconsistent with the General Agreement. Indeed, the efficient operation of the dispute settlement process required that such arguments in the alternative be possible.”⁵⁴³

(4) Protection of confidential information

Paragraph 15 of the 1979 Understanding provides: "... Confidential information which is provided should not be revealed without formal authorization from the contracting party providing the information". Paragraph 6(iv) of its Annex on customary practice provides: "... Written memoranda submitted to the panel have been considered confidential, but are made available to the parties to the dispute ...". See also provisions on protection of confidential information submitted to panels in the Tokyo Round agreements.⁵⁴⁴

9. Participation by third contracting parties not party to the dispute

Paragraph 15 of the 1979 Understanding provides that "Any contracting party having a substantial interest in the matter before a panel, and having notified this to the Council, should have an opportunity to be heard by the panel ...". Paragraph 6(iv) of the Annex thereto on customary practice notes: "... Panels have also heard the views of any contracting party having a substantial interest in the matter, which is not directly party to the dispute, but which has expressed in the Council a desire to present its views ...".

Section F(e) of the 1989 Improvements provides:

- "1. The interests of the parties to the dispute and those of other contracting parties shall be fully taken into account during the panel process.
- "2. Any third contracting party having a substantial interest in a matter before a panel, and having notified this to the Council, shall have an opportunity to be heard by the panel and to make written submissions to the panel. These submissions shall also be given to the parties to the dispute and shall be reflected in the panel report.
- "3. At the request of the third contracting party, the panel may grant the third contracting party access to the written submissions of the panel by those parties to the dispute which have agreed to the disclosure of their submission to the third contracting party".

At the December 1972 Council, when the Panel on "United Kingdom - Dollar Area Quotas" was established, it was noted that the panel would wish to hear from representatives of Jamaica, Trinidad and Tobago, and Cuba on this matter.⁵⁴⁵ The 1973 Panel Report in this case notes that besides the parties to the dispute, the Panel heard from and consulted with the delegations of the Commonwealth Caribbean countries and territories and Cuba, and received a submission from Israel.⁵⁴⁶ The 1978 Panel Report on "EEC - Programme of Minimum Import Prices, Licences and Surety Deposits for Certain Processed Fruits and Vegetables" notes that "Australia, having requested Article XXIII:1 consultations with the EEC concerning the same measures, submitted a written presentation to the Panel outlining Australia's interest in the matter and supporting the United States allegation that these measures were not in accordance with the Community obligations under the GATT".⁵⁴⁷ These are the first recorded instances of third-party participation in panel proceedings. As noted in the 1989 Improvements, the recent practice has been to present in the panel report a complete record of the panel proceedings, including any third-party arguments.

At the June 1994 Council meeting, the Council agreed to the following practices to be applied in the future with respect to third-party participation in panels:

- "1. Delegations in a position to do so, should indicate their intention to participate as a third party in a panel proceeding at the Council session which establishes the panel. Others who wish to indicate a third party interest should do so within the next ten days.

⁵⁴⁷L/4687, adopted on 18 October 1978, 25S/68, 69, para. 1.4. The arguments presented by Australia are not recorded in the report.

- “2. Further to paragraph F(e) (3) of the Decision of 12 April 1989 (BISD 36S/61) and to the Decision of 22 February 1994 (L/7416), it is the understanding of the Council that third parties shall receive the submissions of the parties to the dispute to the first meeting of a panel established by the Council.”⁵⁴⁸

In 1983, as part of the agreement on terms of reference for the Panel on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, an understanding was also agreed which provided, inter alia, that “Given the special nature of this matter, in that the tariff treatment which is to be examined by the Panel is an element of Agreements entered into by the European Community with certain Mediterranean countries, it is expected that the Panel ... in setting up its own working procedures, will provide adequate opportunities for these countries to participate in the work of the Panel as appropriate.”⁵⁴⁹

At the Council meeting of 15 April 1987, the following Chairman’s proposal was made for an Understanding related to the terms of reference of the Panel on “Japan - Trade in Semi-conductors”:

“Given the special nature of the matter to be examined by the Panel, which is related to certain aspects of the arrangement between Japan and the United States concerning trade in semi-conductor products (L/6076), it is understood that in setting up its own working procedures, the Panel will provide adequate opportunity for the United States to participate in the work of the Panel as necessary and appropriate”.

The representative of the United States stated that his delegation “could reluctantly agree to the proposed formulation, provided that all contracting parties were clear on one point: ‘adequate opportunity to participate’ had to be interpreted by the Panel in the same way as this phrase was interpreted in an earlier dispute” [the Citrus dispute referred to directly above]. The representative of the EC stated that “it was up to the complaining country to decide on this matter, including what party was being complained against” and that the Community agreed with the interpretation which the United States wished to give to the Chairman’s proposal, including the reference to the earlier dispute.⁵⁵⁰ The representative of Canada “viewed the US request to participate in the Panel as unique and did not want to see such a request become an established practice of the Council without further discussion and agreement among the contracting parties and suggested that this might be done within the Uruguay Round negotiating group on dispute settlement”. The Council agreed to the Chairman’s proposal.⁵⁵¹

During discussion of the dispute concerning “EEC - Member States’ Import Régimes for Bananas” concerning which a Panel was established at the February 1993 Council meeting, a number of banana-exporting countries in the process of accession to GATT requested the right to participate as observers in the work of the Panel. The Chairman pointed out that the right to participate in panel proceedings was reserved for contracting parties.⁵⁵² At the March 1993 Council meeting, the applicant parties in the dispute concerning “EEC - Member States’ Import Régimes for Bananas” noted that the parties to the dispute had agreed inter alia that the representatives of the Governments of Cameroon, Côte d’Ivoire, Jamaica, Madagascar and Senegal would be invited to all Panel meetings at which the parties were present, and stated that in view of the specific nature of this agreement, in which the parties had accepted conditions beyond those provided for in GATT dispute settlement procedures, this agreement did not create any obligations which could be invoked as a binding precedent in the future. Certain other delegations questioned this agreement.⁵⁵³

The 1993 Panel Report on “EEC - Member States’ Import Régimes for Bananas”, which has not been adopted, notes that the parties to the dispute had agreed (i) that representatives of the Governments of Cameroon, Côte d’Ivoire, Jamaica, Madagascar and Senegal (which had expressed in the Council their wish to participate) would be invited to all Panel meetings at which the parties were present; (ii) that these contracting parties would have to make a submission if they were to attend Panel meetings and that submissions made by such contracting parties should be made in writing, or if made orally, would also be made available in writing; (iii) that the representatives of these contracting parties present at Panel meetings would receive all submissions of the parties; and (iv) that these same contracting parties would be invited by the Panel to speak as appropriate. In light of the above the Panel considered, in the interest of transparency among participants in the Panel process, that it would be reasonable to invite such countries to meetings of the Panel at which the parties were present. The Panel was of the view that this procedure should not be considered a precedent for future panels in light of the very special circumstances of this case. On 5 April 1993, the Panel received a letter from Belize, requesting formally that the Panel suspend its proceedings and with immediate effect request the parties to commence consultations on the issues raised by the complaining parties. Belize also requested that it be admitted as full participant in the Panel proceedings. The Panel informed Belize that the Panel had been established by the GATT Council in accordance with the 1966 Decision, the rules of which obliged the Panel to finish its work and present its findings within 60 days. It was, therefore, not in a position to accept Belize's request for suspension. As concerns the request for full participation in the proceedings, the Panel informed Belize that, on its own, the Panel was not authorized to accept the participation of any country in the Panel process, but that such participation could possibly be agreed between the parties to the dispute. Since the parties were not able to reach such an agreement in the short time available for consultations on this issue before the Panel proceedings commenced, the Panel informed Belize that it could not be admitted as a full participant in the proceedings of the Panel.⁵⁵⁴

Participation of this nature occurred as well in the 1993-94 panel proceeding on "EEC - Import Régime for Bananas". The 1994 Panel Report, which has not been adopted, notes that at the June 1993 Council meeting, representatives of Antigua and Barbuda, Barbados, Belize, Cameroon, Côte d'Ivoire, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ghana, Jamaica, Madagascar, Senegal, St Lucia, St Vincent and the Grenadines, Suriname, Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago and Uganda expressed their respective governments' wish to participate in the work of the Panel. While the Council took note of these statements, there was no consensus on such participation. Subsequently, the Panel considered, and the Parties agreed that, in the interest of transparency among contracting parties having a substantial interest in the trade of bananas, it would be reasonable to invite such countries to meetings of the Panel. The Panel, therefore, invited the representatives of the governments of Belize, Brazil, Cameroon, Côte d'Ivoire, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Jamaica, Madagascar, the Philippines, St Lucia, St Vincent and the Grenadines and Suriname to the Panel meetings at which the parties were present. Submissions by such contracting parties were to be made in writing, or if made orally, were to be made available in writing. The representatives of these contracting parties present at Panel meetings received all submissions of the parties. These same contracting parties were also invited by the Panel to make oral statements at the Panel meetings. The Panel, however, was of the view that this procedure should not be considered a precedent for future panels.⁵⁵⁵

10. Panel reports

Paragraphs 6(v)-(vii) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provide that

"... Panel reports have normally set out findings of fact, the applicability of relevant provisions, and the basic rationale behind any findings and recommendations that it has made.

"The reports of panels have been drafted in the absence of the parties in the light of the information and the statements made.

"To encourage development of mutually satisfactory solutions between the parties and with a view to obtaining their comments, each panel has normally first submitted the descriptive part of its report to the parties concerned, and also their conclusions, or an outline thereof, a reasonable period of time before they have been circulated to the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.

See also the material starting at page 675 under the heading “the CONTRACTING PARTIES ... shall make appropriate recommendations ... or give a ruling”.

(1) Dissenting opinions

Paragraph 6(viii) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides that “... The opinions expressed by the panel members on the matter are anonymous and the panel deliberations are secret”. Only in a very few exceptional cases has a panel report referred to the existence of a dissenting opinion by a member of the Panel.⁵⁵⁶ During the discussion in the Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures of the 1983 Panel Report on “EEC Subsidies on Export of Pasta Products”⁵⁵⁷, which sets out the dissenting opinion of one member of the Panel, it was stated that

“the existence of a dissenting opinion did not alter the Committee’s responsibilities under Articles 18:9 and 13:4 to consider the Panel report as soon as possible and, where the Committee concluded that an export subsidy was being granted in a manner inconsistent with the Code, to make recommendations to resolve the issue. There was nothing in the language of, or customary practice under, the GATT or Code which suggested that only unanimous panel reports could be acted upon”.⁵⁵⁸

(2) Precedential effect of findings in panel reports with regard to later consideration of the same measures

Very many panel reports have referred to and followed the interpretations of the General Agreement in other panel reports. However, on occasion panel findings applying legal rules to facts have not been followed.

For instance, the 1978 Panel Report on “EEC - Programme of Minimum Import Prices, Licenses and Surety Deposits for Certain Processed Fruits and Vegetables” examined the EEC’s minimum import price and associated additional security system for tomato concentrates, in relation to Article XI:2(c)(i) and (ii), and found, inter alia: “The Panel considered that tomato concentrate was perishable because after a certain time it would decline in quality and value. The Panel also considered that tomato concentrate could compete directly with fresh tomatoes insofar as a large number of end-uses were concerned. Therefore, the Panel concluded that tomato concentrate qualified as an ‘agricultural or fisheries product, imported in any form’ within the meaning of Article XI:2(c)”.⁵⁵⁹ However, the 1988 Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products” found that tomato juice, paste and ketchup were not products with respect to which import restrictions could be maintained under Article XI:2(c).⁵⁶⁰

The 1978 Panel Report on “EEC - Programme of Minimum Import Prices, Licenses and Surety Deposits for Certain Processed Fruits and Vegetables” also examined the EEC’s supply management scheme for fresh tomatoes, and noted with respect to the requirements of Article XI:2(c) that “... the intervention system for fresh tomatoes did not qualify as a governmental measure which operated ‘to restrict the quantities of the like domestic product permitted to be marketed or produced’, or ‘to remove a temporary surplus of the like domestic product by making the surplus available to certain groups of domestic consumers free of charge or at prices below the current market level’, within the meaning of Article XI:2(c)(i) and (ii)”.⁵⁶¹ The 1980 Panel Report on “EEC Restrictions on Imports of Apples from Chile” then found with regard to the EEC domestic supply management scheme on apples that “As regards XI:2(c)(i) ... The Panel considered that the EEC did restrict quantities of apples permitted to be marketed, through its system of intervention purchases by member States and compensation to producer groups for withdrawing apples from the market”.⁵⁶² The 1989 Panel Reports on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile” and “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Apples - Complaint by the United States” then for a third time examined EEC measures for horticultural crops in relation to Article XI:2(c)(i). These Reports noted as follows:

“... In considering the facts and arguments relating to Article XI in particular, the Panel took note of the fact that a previous Panel, in 1980, had reported on a complaint involving the same product and the same parties as the present matter and a similar set of GATT issues. The Panel noted carefully the arguments of the parties concerning the precedent value of this Panel’s and other previous Panels’ recommendations, and the arguments on the legitimate expectations of contracting parties arising out of the adoption of Panel reports. The Panel construed its terms of reference to mean that it was authorized to examine the matter referred to it by Chile in the light of all relevant provisions of the General Agreement and those related to its interpretation and implementation. It would take into account the 1980 Panel report and the legitimate expectations created by the adoption of this report, but also other GATT practices and Panel reports adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the particular circumstances of this complaint. The Panel, therefore, did not feel it was legally bound by all the details and legal reasoning of the 1980 Panel report.”⁵⁶³

Both of the 1989 apple Reports also noted that the intervention system for horticultural crops had been examined in 1978 and in 1980 with opposite conclusions as regards consistency with Article XI:2(c). Each of the 1989 apple Reports provided that “While taking careful note of the earlier panel reports, the Panel did not consider they relieved it of the responsibility, under its terms of reference, to carry out its own thorough examination on this important point.”⁵⁶⁴ These Reports then found that “the EEC measures taken under the intervention system for apples did not constitute marketing restrictions of a type which could justify import restrictions under Article XI:2(c)(ii)”.⁵⁶⁵

At the July 1985 Council meeting, the United States requested that the Council, on behalf of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, apply the conclusions of the 1984 Report of the “Panel on Japanese Measures on Imports of Leather” to quantitative restrictions on leather footwear maintained by Japan, since “the same administrative and legal scheme was used to restrict imports of leather footwear as was used for leather”. Other delegations expressed “reservations regarding the proposal that one panel’s recommendation could be applied to another dispute; surely only a panel could determine whether the cases in question were totally identical”. The Council agreed to establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2.⁵⁶⁶

The 1983 Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies” examined claims by Canada regarding an exclusion order issued by the U.S. International Trade Commission (ITC) under Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930, including arguments that the exception under Article XX(d) did not justify trade restrictive measures taken pursuant to Section 337 on two grounds: “(1) differential treatment of foreign products involving a separate adjudicating process was not ‘necessary’ to secure compliance with United States patent laws, and (2) the law with which compliance was sought (Section 337) was ‘inconsistent with the provisions of this agreement’, i.e. Article III of the GATT”.⁵⁶⁷ The Panel found that “the exclusion order issued by the ITC under Section 337 of the United States Tariff Act of 1930 was ‘necessary’ in the sense of Article XX(d) to prevent the importation and sale of automotive spring assemblies infringing the patent, thus protecting the patent holder’s rights and securing compliance with United States patent law.”⁵⁶⁸ The Panel Report was adopted “on the understanding that this shall not foreclose future examination of the use of Section 337 to deal with patent infringement cases from the point of view of consistency with Articles III and XX of the General Agreement”.⁵⁶⁹ The 1989 Panel Report on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930” again examined the use of Section 337 in connection with patent enforcement and found that “the system of determining allegations of violation of United States patent rights under Section 337 of the United States Tariff Act cannot be justified as necessary within the meaning of Article XX(d) so as to permit an exception to the basic obligation contained in Article III:4 of the General Agreement”.⁵⁷⁰

In discussion at the March 1991 Council meeting of Brazil’s request for a Panel on “United States - Denial of Most-favoured-nation Treatment as to Imports of Non-rubber Footwear from Brazil” the representative of the United States stated “that this matter had already been adjudicated” against Brazil under the Subsidies Code in October 1988 and that “re-adjudication would violate the fundamental jurisprudential principle of res judicata - a final decision on a matter constituted an absolute bar to subsequent action thereon”. He also said that “to permit a panel to be established in the present instance would set a bad precedent, namely that if a contracting party lost a panel case, all it needed to do was block adoption and seek a second panel in another forum. He reiterated his Government’s position that the earlier Panel had taken all of Brazil’s arguments into account in reaching its decision, as had been made clear by its Chairman”.⁵⁷¹ The panel was established at the following Council meeting.⁵⁷²

In the panel proceeding in 1992 concerning “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies”, certain of the measures concerned were measures which the 1988 Panel on “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies”⁵⁷³ had found were inconsistent with Articles II:4 and XI:1 of the General Agreement, and specifically, discriminatory practices relating to listing, mark-ups and points of sale. The United States requested that, with respect to these practices, the 1992 Panel make its findings and recommendations before considering the status under the General Agreement of the other practices covered by its 1992 complaint, and stated that Canada had not fulfilled its obligation “to take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of Articles II and XI of the General Agreement by the provincial liquor boards in Canada”. Canada argued that the United States could not assert rights automatically under the 1988 Panel report since it had not been a complaining party, and that substantial change had occurred since 1988. The Panel Report contains the following Decision of the Panel on this issue.

“The Panel gave careful consideration to the United States’ request for expedited proceedings, i.e. for the Panel to make an immediate determination that benefits accruing to the United States under the General Agreement had been nullified or impaired as a result of the practices maintained by the Canadian provincial marketing agencies and examined by the 1988 Panel. In 1988, the Panel had indeed found that certain provincial practices were contrary to the provisions of the General Agreement. Following its recommendation, the CONTRACTING PARTIES had requested Canada to take ‘such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of Articles II and XI of the General Agreement by the provincial liquor boards in Canada’. However, as noted in paragraphs 4.21 and 4.25 of the Panel’s report, it had not made a detailed factual analysis of the practices complained against. The present Panel had now been informed by Canada that changes had occurred with respect to most of the matters dealt with by the Panel in 1988. It, therefore, believed that, before it could make the immediate determination sought by the United States, it would have to make this detailed factual analysis before it could consider whether the Government of Canada had, since 1988, taken such reasonable measures as were available to it to have the provincial agencies bring their practices into line with the 1988 Panel’s findings. In other words, it could not proceed on an expedited basis with respect to the measures addressed in the 1988 Panel report. Under these circumstances, it would accede to the request made by the United States, namely to issue findings and recommendations jointly concerning any and all Canadian provincial liquor board practices which were identified in the submissions of the United States.”⁵⁷⁴

(3) Legal nature of panel reports and precedential nature of panel interpretation of GATT provisions

The 1979 Understanding provides in paragraph 16 that “The function of panels is to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES in discharging their responsibilities under Article XXIII:2”. Paragraph 3 of the Annex thereto provides further that “The function of a panel has normally been to review the facts of a case and the applicability of GATT provisions and to arrive at an objective assessment of these matters.” Paragraph (x) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides that “It is understood that decisions in this process [of dispute settlement] cannot add to or diminish the rights and obligations provided in the General Agreement”.

In the Review Session Working Party on Organizational and Functional Questions in 1954-55 the text of an Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation was agreed upon. Article 3 of this Agreement on “Functions” provided in part that “no decision or other action of the Assembly or any subsidiary body of the Organization shall have the effect of imposing on any Member any new obligation which the Member has not specifically agreed to undertake”. In this connection, the Report of the Working Party notes that “It was ... agreed that an obligation arising from the operation or interpretation of a specific provision of the General Agreement ... including an interpretation that a particular obligation thereunder had become applicable, would not be the imposition of a ‘new obligation’ within the meaning of this paragraph”.⁵⁷⁵ See also generally the material under Article XXV:1 on interpretation of the General Agreement.

In Council discussion in 1981 on the Panel Report on “Spain - Measures concerning Domestic Sale of Soyabean Oil,” the United States representative stated that “There was ... [an] aspect to any panel report that was perhaps more important than the resolution of a particular dispute: panel reports, explicitly and of necessity, interpreted Articles of the General Agreement. He said that when the Council adopted a report, those interpretations became GATT law. His delegation could not agree to the adoption of this report because it interpreted important GATT provisions in a manner that would allow protectionist actions contrary to the language, history and tradition of the provisions in question ...”.⁵⁷⁶ This Panel Report was noted and not adopted; see below at page 762.

During the discussion at the February 1984 on the adoption of the Panel Report on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act”,⁵⁷⁷ the representative of India, supported by the delegations of Brazil, Chile, Pakistan, the Philippines, Colombia, Nicaragua and Peru, stated India’s view “that the Panel’s report could not be taken to provide an opening for the introduction of new themes, such as investments, in the GATT. His delegation also emphasized that the dispute concerned two developed contracting parties. Adoption of the report could not in any way contribute to the evolution of case law applying to less developed contracting parties. The Panel’s report had acknowledged in its paragraph 5.2 that in disputes involving less developed contracting parties, full account should be taken of the special provisions in the General Agreement and dispensations relating to such countries, such as Article XVIII:C. Thus it was clear that the provisions and arguments invoked against Canada in this case could not be legitimately invoked against less developed contracting parties ...”.⁵⁷⁸

At the February 1988 Council meeting, during consideration of adoption of the Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products”,⁵⁷⁹ the representative of the EC, supporting adoption of the report, stated that “The report made clear that the Panel’s findings were limited to the specific measures under examination”.⁵⁸⁰

At the same Council meeting in February 1988, during consideration of adoption of the Panel Report on “United States - Customs User Fee”, the representative of the US, in supporting adoption of the report, stated that “A number of other contracting parties maintained ad valorem user fees, most of which were considerably higher than the US fee. ... As the United States implemented its own conversion to a transaction-based fee system, it would be inquiring into the progress of other countries maintaining ad valorem user fees in bringing these fee systems into conformity with Article VIII of the General Agreement as interpreted by this Panel report. His delegation hoped and expected that formal GATT dispute settlement procedures would not be necessary".⁵⁸¹ The representative of Hong Kong, which had appeared as a third party in the panel proceeding supporting the use of systematic devices for the collection of user fees whether on a flat rate or an ad valorem basis, "noted that the scope of the report was limited to the GATT consistency of the US customs user fee and that the findings should be interpreted in that light".⁵⁸² In Council discussions in 1991 on the implementation of this Panel Report, the representative of the United States stated "that its customs user fee had been revised to address the Panel's findings and recommendations ... and ... met the criteria of Article VIII ... The United States also hoped that other contracting parties currently applying customs fees substantially identical to the US fee, as it had been prior to the changes mentioned, would also alter their own fees to bring them into conformity with Article VIII".⁵⁸³

At the October 1989 Council meeting, the representative of Korea stated that his government could not agree at that time to adoption of the Panel reports on the complaints of Australia, New Zealand and the United States on "Republic of Korea - Restrictions on Imports of Beef" because these reports "were not limited to Korea's beef import régime only, but would, once adopted, constitute a precedent with regard to the invocation of Article XVIII:B by a number of developing contracting parties".⁵⁸⁴

A request for consultations in 1989 by the EEC concerning "Chile - Internal Taxes on Spirits" states that "The Government of Chile levies an additional sales tax of 70% on imported whisky, compared with the rate of 25% for pisco. In the view of the European Communities this situation constitutes a breach of Chile's obligations under Article III:2 ... Whisky and pisco, while they may not be 'like products', are directly competitive or substitutable products, and in this connection the panel on Japanese customs duties, taxes etc. on alcoholic drinks (L/6216) has made very clear findings and constitutes a precedent applicable in the present instance to Chilean taxation of spirits".⁵⁸⁵

(4) Consideration and action on panel reports

(a) Consideration of panel reports

The 1979 Understanding provides in paragraph 21 that "Reports of panels and working parties should be given prompt consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The CONTRACTING PARTIES should take appropriate action on reports of panels and working parties within a reasonable period of time. If the case is one brought by a less-developed contracting party, such action should be taken in a specially convened meeting, if necessary". Paragraph (vii) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides that "Reports of panels should be given prompt consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. Where a decision on the findings contained in a report calls for a ruling or recommendation by the Council, the Council may allow the contracting party concerned a reasonable specified time to indicate what action it proposes to take with a view to the satisfactory settlement of the matter, before making any recommendation or ruling on the basis of the report". Paragraph G of the 1989 Improvements provides:

"1. In order to provide sufficient time for the members of the Council to consider panel reports, the reports shall not be considered for adoption by the Council until thirty days after they have been issued to the contracting parties.

⁵⁸⁵DS9/1, communication dated 31 October 1989.

“2. Contracting parties having objections to panel reports shall give written reasons to explain their objections for circulation at least ten days prior to the Council meeting at which the panel report will be considered.

“3. The parties to a dispute shall have the right to participate fully in the consideration of the panel report by the Council, and their views shall be fully recorded ...

“4. The period from the request under Article XXII:1 or Article XXIII:1 until the Council takes a decision on the panel report shall not, unless agreed to by the parties, exceed fifteen months. The provisions of this paragraph shall not affect the provisions of paragraph 6 of Section F(f)”.

The Panel Report in the recourse by Mexico to Article XXIII:2 on “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna” was circulated on 3 September 1991. The parties to the dispute then requested that the report not be placed on the agenda of the next or subsequent Council meetings. At the February 1992 Council meeting, many contracting parties nevertheless made statements supporting adoption of this Panel Report.⁵⁸⁶ At the March 1992 Council meeting, at which the Report was on the agenda at the request of the EC, the two parties to the dispute discussed measures taken by them toward a solution of the dispute through a bilateral agreement to limit incidental dolphin mortality in tuna fishing in the Eastern Tropical Pacific Ocean. The representative of the United States

“noted that this was the first time that a contracting party not party to a dispute had called for adoption of a panel report by placing it on the Council’s agenda. The United States believed that this was not appropriate and that it would fundamentally change the customary role of third parties in the GATT dispute settlement process. In fact, in the United States’ view, there was no basis in the GATT for such a request. It was perhaps important to note that according to past practice under the GATT, a panel report served only to define, for purposes of the particular dispute, the obligations of the contracting parties that were parties to the dispute. Prior to the adoption of the April 1989 improvements to the GATT dispute settlement rules and procedures, the United States had sought to put forward the position that, upon adoption, panel reports should be treated as a binding interpretation of GATT rules binding upon and applying to all contracting parties. That proposal had been vigorously opposed by many contracting parties, not least of which was the Community, which had maintained that adoption of a report did not constitute a legal precedent and that panel reports had no precedential value with respect to non-parties In the absence of such an understanding among contracting parties, he would note that, in the United States’ view, this report was not on the agenda of the Council for adoption at the present meeting, and that there would be no support from his delegation for adoption”.⁵⁸⁷

The EC representative said in response that “the purpose of the debate at the present meeting had not been to define whether or not a third party had the right to request adoption of a panel report, and that the Community was not asking to innovate in this sense. Indeed, the reason why the Community had had recourse to its own Article XXIII:1 proceedings was precisely because this was an area where there was perhaps some doubt”.⁵⁸⁸

In discussion at the June 1992 Council meeting of the EC’s request for a panel with regard to “United States - Restrictions on Imports of Tuna - Recourse by the EC”, “the Chairman reminded Council members that the adoption of the Panel report on Mexico’s complaint was not the subject of discussion under this agenda item. That report had been discussed at earlier Council meetings and it was clear that as long as the two parties concerned did not want that report to be adopted, it could not be so done”.⁵⁸⁹

(b) Procedure for adoption of panel reports

The Decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES establishing the Council in 1960 provided that the Council would “consider matters arising between sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES which require urgent attention, and to report thereon to the CONTRACTING PARTIES with recommendations as to any action which might appropriately be taken by them at the next regular session. ...”. Accordingly, from 1960 until 1968, decisions on matters under Article XXIII:2, including the adoption of panel reports, were made by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting on recommendations agreed by the Council.⁵⁹⁰ In 1968 the CONTRACTING PARTIES agreed to expand the Council’s authority to cover “all matters of concern to the CONTRACTING PARTIES other than final decisions under paragraph 5 of Article XXV”.⁵⁹¹ Since that time, panel reports have been adopted by the Council (acting for the CONTRACTING PARTIES) or have been adopted at the annual Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES when this would afford more timely action. A general footnote to paragraph F of the 1989 Improvements notes that references to the Council in sections F through I thereof “are without prejudice to the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, for which the Council is empowered to act in accordance with normal GATT practice”.

At the March 1981 Council meeting, in concluding the debate on adoption of the Director-General’s report on working party discussions between the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the European Communities under Article XVI:1 of the possibility of limiting EEC subsidization of sugar exports, and on a draft decision proposed by Australia, the Council Chairman noted that

“in matters of this kind the Council normally proceeded on the basis of consensus. In his view, consensus was understood in GATT to mean that no delegation maintained its objections to a text or attempted to prevent its adoption. He felt that such a consensus did not presently exist in the Council on this matter. He noted that the ten contracting parties in the European Communities were not in agreement with the draft decision as presented by Australia. At the same time, however, he was also very conscious of the weight of opinion expressed by the delegations which had supported either the Australian text as such or its general sense; and he concluded that there was a general desire to arrive at a decision at this meeting. ...”⁵⁹²

A compromise text was adopted providing for a later review by the Council upon further notification of the EEC sugar regulations.⁵⁹³ See also references to this matter above at pages 722 and 726.

In Council discussion in 1982 on the follow-up on the Panel Report on “United States Tax Legislation (DISC)”, which was adopted in December 1981, the representative of Canada “stated that it was not GATT practice to allow a contracting party maintaining an offending measure to block a Council recommendation addressed to it”. This statement was supported by the EC representative who said “that in GATT practice it was not usual that one contracting party should block a Council recommendation calling for it to come into line with the provisions of the General Agreement”.⁵⁹⁴

Paragraph (x) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision provides that “The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirmed that consensus will continue to be the traditional method of resolving disputes; however, they agreed that obstruction in the process of dispute settlement shall be avoided”.⁵⁹⁵ Paragraph G(3) of the 1989 Improvements provides: “... The practice of adopting panel reports by consensus shall be continued, without prejudice to the GATT provisions on decision-making which remain applicable. However, the delaying of the process of dispute settlement shall be avoided”. See also the material on consensus and decisionmaking by the Council and the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in the chapter of this Index on Institutions.

(c) Adoption of panel reports subject to conditions

At the Forty-third Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in December 1987, in connection with consideration of the Panel Report on “Japan - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Agricultural Products”⁵⁹⁶, the representative of Japan noted his government’s strong objections to some parts of the Panel Report, and stated that “Since 12 different items were at issue, it would not have been unnatural to set up 12 separate panels. There was no logical need to treat the 12 items in one set ... Japan could accept adoption of the Panel Reports except the parts concerning certain dairy products and starch, and state-trading”.⁵⁹⁷ Nine other delegations spoke supporting adoption of the report in its entirety. The US representative stated that “Legally, GATT treated panel reports as units; parties could not pick and choose which findings to accept. Partial adoption of a report was unprecedented in GATT. The dispute settlement process would be meaningless if the defendant could pick and choose for adoption only the favourable parts of a panel’s report”.⁵⁹⁸

At the next Council meeting, on 2 February 1988, the representative of Japan noted that “Regrettably, many contracting parties had opposed Japan’s position on the grounds that partial adoption of a panel report should not be established as a precedent ... As a contracting party, Japan fully recognized the importance of assuring the effective functioning of dispute settlement procedures, the basic structure of which was conciliatory rather than adjudicatory in nature. Japan recognized the importance of expeditious adoption of the report in its entirety in order to ensure the effective functioning of dispute settlement procedures. He said that, therefore, Japan would not oppose a consensus to adopt the report in its entirety at the present meeting, provided the Council took note of and put on record his statement in its entirety”.⁵⁹⁹ The representative of Uruguay stated that “... acceptance of the report as a whole implied acceptance of all elements contained in it, particularly the conclusions, which Uruguay hoped would be respected in accordance with the provisions of the General Agreement”.⁶⁰⁰ The report was adopted.

In some instances a panel report has been adopted subject to an understanding. For instance, the four Panel Reports on “Income Tax Practices Maintained by France”, “Income Tax Practices Maintained by Belgium”, “Income Tax Practices Maintained by the Netherlands”, and “United States Tax Legislation (DISC)” were adopted in 1982 subject to an understanding regarding interpretation of the findings; adoption was followed by a Chairman’s statement.⁶⁰¹ The Panel Report on “United States - Imports of Certain Automotive Spring Assemblies” was adopted in 1983 subject to an understanding that its adoption “shall not foreclose future examination of the use of Section 337 to deal with patent infringement cases from the point of view of consistency with Articles III and XX of the General Agreement”.⁶⁰² Section 337 was later examined by the Panel on “United States - Section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930”, the report of which was adopted in 1989.

(d) Action on a panel report other than adoption

In 1981, the Council considered the Panel Report on “Spain - Measures concerning Domestic Sale of Soyabean Oil”. The representative of the United States said that his government, “while disappointed with the result in this case, was not asking the Council to undertake a new examination of the particular Spanish measures that were at issue, not was it asking the Council to make findings or recommendations to Spain in this proceeding ... this was not a case where a party was seeking to block adoption of a report against its own practices. In the view of his authorities, adoption of the Report could contribute nothing more to the settlement of that particular dispute, but would only establish damaging precedents for the interpretation of GATT provisions. The United States believed that the Council should take note of the Panel Report and of the comments made, including the written comments previously submitted”.⁶⁰³ In the ensuing discussion many contracting parties criticized the legal findings and conclusions in the Panel Report and their implications for future interpretation of Article III. At the end of the debate the Council took note of the Panel Report and of the statements made by the parties and in the Council.⁶⁰⁴

During this debate, “the Chairman of the Council said that, generally speaking, panel reports had been adopted, although there were five exceptions to this practice, the Council having adopted one report in principle and having taken note of four other reports. Generally speaking, it was for the Council itself to decide in each case how to proceed”.⁶⁰⁵

At the May 1990 Council meeting, in discussion of the Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-containing Products Applied under the 1955 Waiver and under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions”⁶⁰⁶ the EEC suggested that the Council take note of the Panel report, including its conclusions. The Special Adviser to the Director-General, in response to an inquiry by the EEC, stated that “to his knowledge there had been only one such precedent where the Council had taken note of a panel report, and that this had involved a dispute between the United States and Spain regarding certain Spanish regulations concerning vegetable oil.”⁶⁰⁷ The United States had not agreed to adoption of the report and its opinion had been shared by many other contracting parties”. The representative of the United States stated that “his own delegation’s research had shown that 24 contracting parties in [the Soyabean Oil] case had expressed fundamental disagreement with the Panel’s reasoning and had therefore urged that the Council do no more than note the report. In the present dispute, it was clear that 23 other contracting parties had not joined the Community in questioning the report and arguing that it not be adopted; nor had ten, or even five -- in fact, none had done so”.⁶⁰⁸ The report was adopted on 7 November 1990.

11. Disputes involving developing contracting parties

Paragraph 5 of the 1979 Understanding provides that “During consultations, contracting parties should give special attention to the problems of less-developed contracting parties”. Paragraph 6(ii) of the 1979 Understanding Annex on customary practice provides that “The practice has been to appoint a [panel] member or members from developing countries when the dispute is between a developing and a developed country”.

Concerning disputes in which a developing contracting party is the applicant party and a developed country is the respondent party, see the 1966 Procedures and paragraph 8 of the 1979 Understanding regarding availability of the good offices of the Director-General in such disputes if requested by the developing contracting party.

Concerning disputes involving measures taken by developing contracting parties, see paragraph F(f)7 of the 1989 Improvements providing extension of time periods for consultations and requiring that sufficient time be provided in examining complaints against such contracting parties for them to prepare and present argumentation.

Paragraph H.1 of the 1989 Improvements provides that “While the Secretariat assists contracting parties in respect of dispute settlement at their request, there may also be a need to provide additional legal advice and assistance in respect of dispute settlement to developing contracting parties. To this end, the Secretariat shall make available a qualified legal expert within the Technical Co-operation Division to any developing contracting party which so requests. This expert shall assist the developing contracting party in a manner ensuring the continued impartiality of the Secretariat”.

E. SPECIAL PROCEDURES FOR SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES UNDER THE GATT

1. 1966 Decision on Procedures to be followed in consultations between a less-developed and a developed contracting party

(1) Background and interpretation

The text of the 1966 Procedures appears above at page 641.

The 1966 Procedures emerged from proposals first put forward in the Committee on the Legal and Institutional Framework of GATT during the negotiation of Part IV of the General Agreement. After the conclusion of negotiations on Part IV, the Committee on Trade and Development was established and was given the task of pursuing outstanding proposals for the amendment of Article XXIII, in the light of Part IV, to take account of difficulties experienced by less-developed countries in using that Article. These discussions took place in 1965-66 in the Committee's Ad Hoc Working Group on Legal Amendments, and are summarized in the Committee's 1966 Report.⁶⁰⁹ The 1966 Report notes that the decision text "embodied the agreement reached in the Committee on procedures for more speedy and efficient use of the provisions of Article XXIII by less-developed contracting parties".⁶¹⁰ The Report also records that "The Committee agreed that the phrase 'shall consider what measures' in paragraph 10 of the Decision 'is intended to mean that the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall consider the matter with a view to finding appropriate solution'.⁶¹¹ In this connection, the Report also notes that the Chairman of the Committee, in presenting the draft decision to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for adoption, asked to be placed on record the following understanding regarding its adoption:

"1. In consultations to be carried out by the Director-General under paragraph 3 of the draft decision, the Director-General would, in addition to the entities mentioned, be free to consult such experts as he considered would assist him in studying the facts and in finding solutions.

"2. With respect to paragraph 6 of the draft decision, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may provide more particular terms of reference for any such panel in order to assist them to assess the relative impact of the measures complained of on the economies of the contracting parties concerned and to consider the adequacy of any measures which those contracting parties would be prepared to take to remedy the situation. In establishing such particular terms of reference, the CONTRACTING PARTIES or the Council should bear in mind the desirability of having such panels appraise, in particular, the following elements:

"(a) the damage incurred through the incidence of the measures complained of upon the export earnings of the export earnings and economic effort of the less-developed contracting party;

"(b) the compensatory or remedial measures which the contracting party whose measures are complained of would be prepared to take to make good the damage inflicted by their application;

"(c) the effects of such measures as the injured contracting party would be prepared to take in relation to the contracting party whose measures have nullified or impaired the benefits deriving from the General Agreement which the former contracting party is entitled to expect."⁶¹²

In this connection see also paragraphs 21 and 23 of the 1979 Understanding and paragraph I.4 of the 1989 Improvements.

Paragraph 7 of the 1979 Understanding provides that "The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirm that the customary practice includes the procedures for the settlement of disputes between developed and less-developed countries adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1966 ... and that these remain available to less-developed contracting parties wishing to use them". Paragraph 2 of its Annex on customary practice describes the 1966 Procedures. Paragraph 4 of the 1989 Improvements provides that "All the points set out in this Decision shall be applied without prejudice to any provision on special and differential treatment for developing contracting parties in the existing instruments on dispute settlement including the CONTRACTING PARTIES' Decision of 5 April 1966".

The applicability of the 1966 Procedures was discussed at the March 1993 meeting of the Council.⁶¹³

(2) Invocations of good offices under 1966 Procedures

Paragraphs 1 through 3 of the 1966 Procedures, which provide for "good offices" by the Director-General, have been invoked in the following instances.

- In May 1978, after bilateral consultations between Chile and the EEC relating to EEC refunds on exports of malted barley did not arrive at a mutually satisfactory solution, "the matter was referred by Chile to the Director-General under the Decision of 5 April 1966 so that, acting in an ex officio capacity, the Director-General might use his good offices with a view to facilitating a solution".⁶¹⁴
- In 1979, India invoked the 1966 Procedures with regard to Japanese import restrictions on leather. The parties agreed to a mutually satisfactory solution in bilateral consultations initiated by the GATT Secretariat.
- In 1986, Mexico requested consultations with the United States under Article XXIII:1 concerning taxes on petroleum levied under the Superfund Amendments and Reauthorization Act of 1986; the matter was referred to the Director-General on 13 January 1987, a panel was established on 4 February 1987 which consolidated the complaints of Mexico, Canada and the EC, and the panel submitted a report to the parties to the dispute on 27 May 1987.⁶¹⁵
- In November 1987, Brazil requested consultations with the United States concerning the disruption of trade caused by an announcement of intended tariff increases on imports from Brazil and prohibitions of imports of certain computers from Brazil. In December 1987 Brazil requested the good offices of the Director-General.⁶¹⁶
- In September 1992, Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela requested the good offices of the Director-General "in order to facilitate a satisfactory solution to the dispute over measures to restrict the import of bananas currently applied by some member States of the EC". These measures had been the subject of consultations under Article XXII:1.⁶¹⁷ At the beginning of December 1992 the Director-General suggested, and the parties agreed, that the formal good offices procedure be suspended until 15 January 1993, during which time the Director-General would pursue informal consultations. However, the informal consultations were terminated on 13 January 1993 and the two-month period for their completion started running again as of 14 January, and terminated on 10 February 1993.⁶¹⁸
- At the February 1993 Council meeting, Brazil requested the good offices of the Director-General in relation to its dispute with the United States concerning the application of a bilateral textile agreement concluded under the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles.⁶¹⁹

(3) Application of paragraphs 4 and 5 of the 1966 Procedures

Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the 1966 Procedures, which provide for submission of a report by the Director-General to the Council and appointment of a panel of experts, were invoked for the first time in February 1993 in connection with the dispute between Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua and Venezuela on the one hand and the EC on the other, concerning restrictions on imports of bananas applied by member States of the EC. The five applicant contracting parties requested the Director-General to refer the matter to the Council.⁶²⁰ In discussion of this matter at the 10 February 1993 meeting of the Council, the Chairman said that although the good offices process would not end until midnight that day, the Director-General was prepared to present his formal report to the Council now, at the request of the Latin American banana-exporting countries.⁶²¹

Upon presentation of the report by the Director-General, the Chairman noted that under paragraph 5 of the 1966 Procedures, the Council had to proceed to establish a panel upon receipt of the Director-General's report. The Council agreed to establish a panel in principle, on the understanding that the sixty-day period for the submission of its findings would only begin once its terms of reference and composition had been agreed, and that this would not be taken as a precedent for the interpretation of the 1966 Procedures. Furthermore, as provided in the 1989 Improvements, the panel would have standard terms of reference unless the parties to the dispute agreed otherwise within the following 20 days. It was noted by one delegation that nothing that was agreed at that meeting would constitute an interpretation of general application regarding the conjunction between the 1989 and 1966 procedures.⁶²² The Panel Report on "EEC - Member States' Import Régimes on Bananas", which has not been adopted, was submitted to the parties to the dispute on 19 May 1993 and was issued on 3 June 1993.⁶²³

2. Good offices and conciliation

The 1966 Procedures refer to referral of certain matters "to the Director-General, so that, acting in an ex officio capacity, he may use his good offices with a view to facilitating a solution"; see above. However, "good offices" are available for other disputes as well. Paragraph 8 of the 1979 Understanding provides as follows:

"If a dispute is not resolved through consultations the contracting parties concerned may request an appropriate body or individual to use their good offices with a view to the conciliation of the outstanding differences between the parties. If the unresolved dispute is one in which a less-developed contracting party has brought a complaint against a developed contracting party, the less-developed contracting party may request the good offices of the Director-General who, in carrying out his tasks, may consult with the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the Chairman of the Council".

"Good offices" of the Director-General were resorted to at the July 1982 Council meeting by the United States and the EEC, at the suggestion of a number of other contracting parties, on the occasion of the request by the United States for the establishment of a panel concerning EEC tariff treatment of imports of citrus and citrus products.⁶²⁴ At the October 1982 Council meeting, the Director-General reported that he had met a number of times with the two parties and had made a proposal on the basis of which the two parties might open negotiations, but on the basis of the response to his proposal he had concluded that no purpose would be served to continue the process of good offices, as it did not appear to be possible to conciliate the outstanding differences between the parties.⁶²⁵

Paragraph (i) of the 1982 Ministerial Decision further provides that

“With reference to paragraph 8 of the Understanding, if a dispute is not resolved through consultations, any party to a dispute may, with the agreement of the other party, seek the good offices of the Director-General or of an individual or group of persons nominated by the Director-General. This conciliatory process would be carried out expeditiously, and the Director-General would inform the Council of the outcome of the conciliatory process. Conciliation proceedings, and in particular positions taken by the parties to the dispute during consultations, shall be confidential, and without prejudice to the rights of either party in any further proceedings under Article XXIII:2. It would remain open at any time during any conciliatory process for either party to the dispute to refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.

In 1988 the Director-General confirmed that the first sentence of this paragraph means that the Director-General may designate a personal representative to conduct good offices.⁶²⁶

At the Forty-third Session in December 1987, the Director-General informed the CONTRACTING PARTIES that the EEC and Japan had jointly requested conciliation by the Director-General under paragraph 8 of the 1979 Understanding in their dispute concerning certain pricing and trading practices for copper in Japan.⁶²⁷ Mr. Gardner Patterson was nominated as the Personal Representative of the Director-General and was assisted in establishing factual information by an independent expert on the copper market. The Good Offices Report by the Personal Representative was circulated to the parties on 16 December 1988 and to contracting parties on 31 January 1988; it provides a number of factual conclusions and (as requested by the parties) an advisory opinion, that the parties resolve the dispute by entering into reciprocal and mutually advantageous negotiations with a view to reduction or elimination of this tariff on an m.f.n. basis, in the context of the Uruguay Round.⁶²⁸

At the special meeting of the Council in October 1988 to review developments in the trading system, the Director-General informed the Council that in April 1988, Canada and the EC had asked him, with reference to paragraph 8 of the 1979 Understanding, to render an advisory opinion on whether a tariff concession granted by Portugal to Canada in 1961 was applicable to wet salted cod. This issue had arisen in tariff negotiations between Canada and the EC under Article XXIV:6. He had agreed on 15 April to render such an opinion and on 15 July had made it available to the two parties concerned.⁶²⁹

Paragraph D of the 1989 Improvements provides as follows:

“1. Good offices, conciliation and mediation are procedures that are undertaken voluntarily if the parties to the dispute so agree. They may be requested at any time by any party to a dispute. They may begin at any time and be terminated at any time. Once terminated, the complaining party can then proceed with a request for the establishment of a panel or a working party under Article XXIII:2. When good offices, conciliation or mediation are entered into within sixty days of a request for consultations, the complaining party must allow a period of sixty days from the date of the request for consultations before requesting the establishment of a panel or working party. The complaining party may request a panel or a working party during the sixty days if the parties to the dispute jointly consider that the good offices, conciliation or mediation process has failed to settle the dispute.

“2. If the parties to a dispute agree, procedures for good offices, conciliation or mediation may continue while the panel or working party process proceeds.

“3. The Director-General may, acting in an ex officio capacity, offer his good offices, conciliation or mediation with the view to assisting contracting parties to settle a dispute”.

3. Arbitration

Paragraph E of the 1989 Improvements provides as follows:

“1. Expeditious arbitration within GATT as an alternative means of dispute settlement can facilitate the solution of certain disputes that concern issues that are clearly defined by both parties.

“2. Resort to arbitration shall be subject to mutual agreement of the parties which shall agree on the procedures to be followed. Agreements to resort to arbitration shall be notified to all contracting parties sufficiently in advance of the actual commencement of the arbitration process.

“3. Other contracting parties may become party to an arbitration proceeding upon the agreement of the parties which have agreed to have recourse to arbitration. The parties to the proceeding shall agree to abide by the arbitration award”.

Paragraph B of the 1989 Improvements provides that “... arbitration awards within GATT ... must be notified to the Council where any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto”.

In March 1990, Canada requested a panel under Article XXIII:2 in respect of Canada's rights related to the export of grains to the EEC arising out of the introduction of the common agricultural policy and two 1962 bilateral agreements on wheat with the EEC.⁶³⁰ On 16 July 1990, Canada and the EC notified that they had agreed to have recourse to arbitration in respect of this dispute on the basis of agreed terms of reference; the terms of reference, the texts of the agreements and the name of the agreed arbitrator (Mr. Gardner Patterson, former Deputy Director-General of GATT) were included in the notification.⁶³¹ The arbitration award was circulated in October 1990. At the November Council meeting, the EC representative stated that “the arbitration proceeding had been a positive experience. The rules of the game of arbitration required that parties to the proceedings agree to abide by the arbitration award; whether the Community liked the results or not, it would abide by the rules”.⁶³²

At the November 1993 meeting of the Committee on Technical Barriers to Trade, the representative of Canada reported that her authorities were seeking to resolve a ban by Mexico on imports of seed potatoes, and noted that in February 1993, Canada and Mexico had agreed to a process whereby the issue had been referred to a third party for binding arbitration; the arbitrator had issued his report in early April, but a number of technical issues remained unresolved.⁶³³

See also references to arbitration under Article XXVIII:3.

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

In the US Draft Charter, the article on consultation in the commercial policy chapter (Article 30) included both provisions on consultation and provisions on nullification or impairment. In the London and New York drafts of the Charter these provisions appeared as two separate paragraphs of Article 35, still in the commercial policy chapter. During discussions in Geneva, it was decided to move the provisions on nullification or impairment to Articles 89 and 90 in Chapter VIII of the Charter, and to expand their scope to cover the entire Charter. The provisions on consultation remained in Article 41.

Article XXIII:1 in the 30 October 1947 text of the General Agreement was identical to Article 89 of the Geneva Draft Charter, except that Article 89 referred to “Members” of the ITO, benefits under the Charter, and attainment of the objectives in Article 1 of the Charter, and Article 89 required that the Members concerned keep the Director-General generally informed of any discussions undertaken. Article XXIII:2 was closely similar to ⁶³⁰DS12/2, dated 23 March 1990.

⁶³¹DS12/3, dated 8 August 1990.

⁶³²C/M/246, p. 25, discussing DS12/R (reprinted at 37S/80).

⁶³³TBT/M/45, para. 63.

Article 90 of the Geneva Draft, except that Article 90 provided for investigation by the Executive Board or the Conference of the ITO, provided for review of Executive Board rulings by a resolution of the Conference of the ITO, and provided for referral of matters to arbitration by the Executive Board with the consent of the Members concerned. Article 91 of the Geneva Draft provided that the Conference or the Executive Board could request advisory opinions from the International Court of Justice regarding legal questions within the scope of the activities of the ITO; it also provided that Conference resolutions under Article 90 and Conference decisions under any other Article would be subject to review by the International Court of Justice through a request by the ITO for an advisory opinion under the Statute of the International Court of Justice. The provisions of Article 91 were not included in the General Agreement at all.

Articles 89-92 of the Geneva Draft Charter was replaced at Havana by Chapter VIII (Articles 92-97) on “Settlement of Differences” in the Havana Charter. The main changes in the Havana Charter were the following:

- (a) The wording of paragraphs 1(a) and 1(b) of Article 89 of the Geneva Draft was substantially changed in Article 93:1 of the Havana Charter.
- (b) The provisions on arbitration were further developed in 2 and 3 of Article 93.
- (c) Paragraph 2 of Article 94 provided a detailed list of possible actions of the Executive Board on having determined whether a nullification or impairment existed.
- (d) Additional procedural provisions were added in the Havana Charter which do not appear in the GATT.

The Charter dispute settlement provisions as modified at Havana were not taken into the General Agreement. The Report of the Sub-Committee on Supersession, which was appointed at the First Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to consider Article XXIX, proposed the insertion of Article XXIX:4 providing that if the Charter should cease to be in force after it had entered into force, the provisions of Part II of the General Agreement would again enter into force, and that except for Article XXIII the provisions of Part II would be replaced by the corresponding Charter provisions. The Report of the Sub-Committee notes in explanation that “it is considered that the form in which [this Article] appear[s] in the Charter is not suitable for the General Agreement”.⁶³⁴

In the Review Session of 1954 a number of proposals for amendment of Article XXIII were considered and rejected: see page 690 above. It was agreed that upon entry into force of the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation (which included dispute settlement provisions in Article 14) Article XXIII would be amended by deleting all but the first sentence⁶³⁵; however, the Agreement never entered into force. Some minor amendments to paragraph 2, suggested by the Legal and Drafting Committee, were also agreed: “concession(s) or other obligation(s)” were substituted for “obligation(s) or concession(s)” in the fourth and fifth sentences, and “Executive Secretary to the CONTRACTING PARTIES” was substituted for “Secretary General of the United Nations” in the fifth sentence, consequential to a change made in the deposit provisions of Article XXVI.⁶³⁶ These amendments were effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, and entered into force 7 October 1957.

Proposals to amend Article XXIII were also considered in 1965-66, but instead it was decided to adopt the 1966 Procedures as a Decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES; see references to this work in the chapter on Part IV and at pages 683 and 764 above.

V. TABLE OF DISPUTES

Definitions

Title indicates the title of the dispute. Where there is a report reprinted in the Basic Instruments and Selected Documents (BISD) series, the title corresponds to the title of the report in the BISD. Where the report is not reprinted in the BISD, the title corresponds to the title in the document cited. Where no formal title for a dispute is indicated in a GATT document (for instance, in the case of bilateral consultations under Article XXIII:1 referred to in session records), a title has been composed for the purposes of this table from the name of the defendant contracting party and the measure in question.

Applicant indicates the contracting party or parties having invoked Article XXIII.

Consultations indicates the date of the request for consultations and the relevant document reference. The date indicated is the date of the GATT document recording a request for consultations, or if there is no such document, then the date of the meeting at which a request for consultations was made. If a reference to a consultation only appears in minutes of a meeting held after the date that the consultation took place, the date in this column is the date of the consultation, or as a last resort the date of that meeting. In some instances the date of the request is not indicated, either because there is no formal record in a GATT document of consultations having been requested or held; or because consultations were held under Article XXII:1 (see the separate table under Article XXII); or because a claim was brought directly under Article XXIII:2, or under Article XXIII:1(c).

Referral indicates the date of a request for a panel or working party or for a ruling under Article XXIII:2. The date indicated is the date of the GATT document recording the request or the date of the meeting at which the request was made. The date of referral may be the same as the date in the consultations column when the only record of consultations under Article XXIII:1 is a reference in the panel request to the fact that such consultations had been held. The distinction between consultation requests and referrals under Article XXIII:2 is clearest since 1989.

Panel established refers to the date of the decision to establish a panel or working party. Report circulated refers to the circulation of the panel or working party report to all contracting parties, and provides references to the original GATT document in question and its republication, if any, in the Basic Instruments and Selected Documents (BISD) series published by the Secretariat. Report adopted gives the date of adoption of the report and the document recording the decision. Other references are GATT documents referring to the dispute in question which were issued on or after the date of referral to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

This table has been updated to January 1995. It concerns only disputes under Article XXIII of the GATT 1947 and does not cover disputes under the multilateral agreements negotiated in the Tokyo Round. No disputes have been brought under either the GATT 1947 or the Tokyo Round agreements since entry into force of the WTO Agreement on 1 January 1995. The Legal Affairs Division of the Secretariat maintains a database concerning current and past disputes under the GATT, the Tokyo Round agreements and the WTO Agreement.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXIV, INTERPRETATIVE NOTE AD ARTICLE XXIV AND UNDERSTANDING ON THE INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE XXIV OF THE GATT 1994

Article XXIV

Territorial Application -- Frontier Traffic -- Customs Unions and Free-trade Areas

1. The provisions of this Agreement shall apply to the metropolitan customs territories of the contracting parties and to any other customs territories in respect of which this Agreement has been accepted under Article XXVI or is being applied under Article XXXIII or pursuant to the Protocol of Provisional Application. Each such customs territory shall, exclusively for the purposes of the territorial application of this Agreement, be treated as though it were a contracting party; Provided that the provisions of this paragraph shall not be construed to create any rights or obligations as between two or more customs territories in respect of which this Agreement has been accepted under Article XXVI or is being applied under Article XXXIII or pursuant to the Protocol of Provisional Application by a single contracting party.

2. For the purposes of this Agreement a customs territory shall be understood to mean any territory with respect to which separate tariffs or other regulations of commerce are maintained for a substantial part of the trade of such territory with other territories.

3. The provisions of this Agreement shall not be construed to prevent:

- (a) Advantages accorded by any contracting party to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic;
- (b) Advantages accorded to the trade with the Free Territory of Trieste by countries contiguous to that territory, provided that such advantages are not in conflict with the Treaties of Peace arising out of the Second World War.

4. The contracting parties recognize the desirability of increasing freedom of trade by the development, through voluntary agreements, of closer integration between the economies of the countries parties to such agreements. They also recognize that the purpose of a customs union or of a free-trade area should be to facilitate trade between the constituent territories and not to raise barriers to the trade of other contracting parties with such territories.

5. Accordingly, the provisions of this Agreement shall not prevent, as between the territories of contracting parties, the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area or the adoption of an interim agreement necessary for the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area; Provided that:

- (a) with respect to a customs union, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a customs union, the duties and other regulations of commerce imposed at the institution of any such union or interim agreement in respect of trade with contracting parties not parties to such union or agreement shall not on the whole be higher or more restrictive than the general incidence of the duties and regulations of commerce applicable in the constituent territories prior to the formation of such union or the adoption of such interim agreement, as the case may be;
- (b) with respect to a free-trade area, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a free-trade area, the duties and other regulations of commerce maintained in each of the constituent territories and applicable at the formation of such free-trade area or the adoption of such interim agreement to the trade of contracting parties not included in such area or not parties to such agreement shall not be higher or more restrictive than the corresponding duties and other regulations of commerce existing in the same constituent territories prior to the formation of the free-trade area, or interim agreement, as the case may be; and
- (c) any interim agreement referred to in sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) shall include a plan and schedule for the formation of such a customs union or of such a free-trade area within a reasonable length of time.

6. If, in fulfilling the requirements of sub-paragraph 5 (a), a contracting party proposes to increase any rate of duty inconsistently with the provisions of Article II, the procedure set forth in Article XXVIII shall apply. In providing for compensatory adjustment, due account shall be taken of the compensation already afforded by the reductions brought about in the corresponding duty of the other constituents of the union.

7. (a) Any contracting party deciding to enter into a customs union or free-trade area, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of such a union or area, shall promptly notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES and shall make available to them such information regarding the proposed union or area as will enable them to make such reports and recommendations to contracting parties as they may deem appropriate.

(b) If, after having studied the plan and schedule included in an interim agreement referred to in paragraph 5 in consultation with the parties to that agreement and taking due account of the information made available in accordance with the provisions of sub-paragraph (a), the CONTRACTING PARTIES find that such agreement is not likely to result in the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area within the period contemplated by the parties to the agreement or that such period is not a reasonable one, the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall make recommendations to the parties to the agreement. The parties shall not maintain or put into force, as the case may be, such agreement if they are not prepared to modify it in accordance with these recommendations.

(c) Any substantial change in the plan or schedule referred to in paragraph 5(c) shall be communicated to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which may request the contracting parties concerned to consult with them if the change seems likely to jeopardize or delay unduly the formation of the customs union or of the free-trade area.

8. For the purposes of this Agreement:

- (a) A customs union shall be understood to mean the substitution of a single customs territory for two or more customs territories, so that
 - (i) duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce (except, where necessary, those permitted under Articles XI, XII, XIII, XIV, XV and XX) are eliminated with respect to substantially all the trade between the constituent territories of the union or at least with respect to substantially all the trade in products originating in such territories, and,
 - (ii) subject to the provisions of paragraph 9, substantially the same duties and other regulations of commerce are applied by each of the members of the union to the trade of territories not included in the union;
- (b) A free-trade area shall be understood to mean a group of two or more customs territories in which the duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce (except, where necessary, those permitted under Articles XI, XII, XIII, XIV, XV and XX) are eliminated on substantially all the trade between the constituent territories in products originating in such territories.

9. The preferences referred to in paragraph 2 of Article 1 shall not be affected by the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area but may be eliminated or adjusted by means of negotiations with contracting parties affected.* This procedure of negotiations with affected contracting parties shall, in particular, apply to the elimination of preferences required to conform with the provisions of paragraph 8 (a)(i) and paragraph 8 (b).

10. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may by a two-thirds majority approve proposals which do not fully comply with the requirements of paragraphs 5 to 9 inclusive, provided that such proposals lead to the formation of a customs union or a free-trade area in the sense of this Article.

11. Taking into account the exceptional circumstances arising out of the establishment of India and Pakistan as independent States and recognizing the fact that they have long constituted an economic unit, the contracting parties agree that the provisions of this Agreement shall not prevent the two countries from entering into special arrangements with respect to the trade between them, pending the establishment of their mutual trade relations on a definitive basis.*

12. Each contracting party shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of this Agreement by the regional and local governments and authorities within its territory.

Interpretative Note Ad Article XXIV from Annex I

Paragraph 9

It is understood that the provisions of Article I would require that, when a product which has been imported into the territory of a member of a customs union or free-trade area at a preferential rate of duty is re-exported to the territory of another member of such union or area, the latter member should collect a duty equal to the difference between the duty already paid and any higher duty that would be payable if the product were being imported directly into its territory.

Paragraph 11

Measures adopted by India and Pakistan in order to carry out definitive trade arrangements between them, once they have been agreed upon, might depart from particular provisions of this Agreement, but these measures would in general be consistent with the objectives of the Agreement.

UNDERSTANDING ON THE INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE XXIV
OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE 1994

Members,

Having regard to the provisions of Article XXIV of GATT 1994;

Recognizing that customs unions and free trade areas have greatly increased in number and importance since the establishment of GATT 1947 and today cover a significant proportion of world trade;

Recognizing the contribution to the expansion of world trade that may be made by closer integration between the economies of the parties to such agreements;

Recognizing also that such contribution is increased if the elimination between the constituent territories of duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce extends to all trade, and diminished if any major sector of trade is excluded;

Reaffirming that the purpose of such agreements should be to facilitate trade between the constituent territories and not to raise barriers to the trade of other Members with such territories; and that in their formation or enlargement the parties to them should to the greatest possible extent avoid creating adverse effects on the trade of other Members;

Convinced also of the need to reinforce the effectiveness of the role of the Council for Trade in Goods in reviewing agreements notified under Article XXIV, by clarifying the criteria and procedures for the assessment of new or enlarged agreements, and improving the transparency of all Article XXIV agreements;

Recognizing the need for a common understanding of the obligations of Members under paragraph 12 of Article XXIV;

Hereby agree as follows:

1. Customs unions, free-trade areas, and interim agreements leading to the formation of a customs union or free-trade area, to be consistent with Article XXIV, must satisfy, inter alia, the provisions of paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 of that Article.

Article XXIV:5

2. The evaluation under paragraph 5(a) of Article XXIV of the general incidence of the duties and other regulations of commerce applicable before and after the formation of a customs union shall in respect of duties and charges be based upon an overall assessment of weighted average tariff rates and of customs duties collected. This assessment shall be based on import statistics for a previous representative period to be supplied by the customs union, on a tariff-line basis and in values and quantities, broken down by WTO country of origin. The Secretariat shall compute the weighted average tariff rates and customs duties collected in accordance with the methodology used in the assessment of tariff offers in the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations. For this purpose, the duties and charges to be taken into consideration shall be the applied rates of duty. It is recognized that for the purpose of the overall assessment of the incidence of other regulations of commerce for which quantification and aggregation are difficult, the examination of individual measures, regulations, products covered and trade flows affected may be required.

3. The "reasonable length of time" referred to in paragraph 5(c) of Article XXIV should exceed 10 years only in exceptional cases. In cases where Members parties to an interim agreement believe that 10 years would be insufficient they shall provide a full explanation to the Council for Trade in Goods of the need for a longer period.

Article XXIV:6

4. Paragraph 6 of Article XXIV establishes the procedure to be followed when a Member forming a customs union proposes to increase a bound rate of duty. In this regard Members reaffirm that the procedure set forth in Article XXVIII, as elaborated in the guidelines adopted on 10 November 1980 (BISD 27S/26-28) and in the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of GATT 1994, must be commenced before tariff concessions are modified or withdrawn upon the formation of a customs union or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a customs union.

5. These negotiations will be entered into in good faith with a view to achieving mutually satisfactory compensatory adjustment. In such negotiations, as required by paragraph 6 of Article XXIV, due account shall be taken of reductions of duties on the same tariff line made by other constituents of the customs union upon its formation. Should such reductions not be sufficient to provide the necessary compensatory adjustment, the customs union would offer compensation, which may take the form of reductions of duties on other tariff lines. Such an offer shall be taken into consideration by the Members having negotiating rights in the binding being modified or withdrawn. Should the compensatory adjustment remain unacceptable, negotiations should be continued. Where, despite such efforts, agreement in negotiations on compensatory adjustment under Article XXVIII as elaborated by the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of GATT 1994 cannot be reached within a reasonable period from the initiation of negotiations, the customs union shall, nevertheless, be free to modify or withdraw the concessions; affected Members shall then be free to withdraw substantially equivalent concessions in accordance with Article XXVIII.

6. GATT 1994 imposes no obligation on Members benefiting from a reduction of duties consequent upon the formation of a customs union, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a customs union, to provide compensatory adjustment to its constituents.

Review of Customs Unions and Free-Trade Areas

7. All notifications made under paragraph 7(a) of Article XXIV shall be examined by a working party in the light of the relevant provisions of GATT 1994 and of paragraph 1 of this Understanding. The working party shall submit a report to the Council for Trade in Goods on its findings in this regard. The Council for Trade in Goods may make such recommendations to Members as it deems appropriate.

8. In regard to interim agreements, the working party may in its report make appropriate recommendations on the proposed time-frame and on measures required to complete the formation of the customs union or free-trade area. It may if necessary provide for further review of the agreement.

9. Members parties to an interim agreement shall notify substantial changes in the plan and schedule included in that agreement to the Council for Trade in Goods and, if so requested, the Council shall examine the changes.

10. Should an interim agreement notified under paragraph 7(a) of Article XXIV not include a plan and schedule, contrary to paragraph 5(c) of Article XXIV, the working party shall in its report recommend such a plan and schedule. The parties shall not maintain or put into force, as the case may be, such agreement if they are not prepared to modify it in accordance with these recommendations. Provision shall be made for subsequent review of the implementation of the recommendations.

11. Customs unions and constituents of free-trade areas shall report periodically to the Council for Trade in Goods, as envisaged by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to GATT 1947 in their instruction to the GATT 1947 Council concerning reports on regional agreements (BISD 18S/38), on the operation of the relevant agreement. Any significant changes and/or developments in the agreements should be reported as they occur.

Dispute Settlement

12. The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of GATT 1994 as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding may be invoked with respect to any matters arising from the application of those provisions of Article XXIV relating to customs unions, free-trade areas or interim agreements leading to the formation of a customs union or free-trade area.

Article XXIV:12

13. Each Member is fully responsible under GATT 1994 for the observance of all provisions of GATT 1994, and shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure such observance by regional and local governments and authorities within its territory.

14. The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of GATT 1994 as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding may be invoked in respect of measures affecting its observance taken by regional or local governments or authorities within the territory of a Member. When the Dispute Settlement Body has ruled that a provision of GATT 1994 has not been observed, the responsible Member shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure its observance. The provisions relating to compensation and suspension of concessions or other obligations apply in cases where it has not been possible to secure such observance.

15. Each Member undertakes to accord sympathetic consideration to and afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding any representations made by another Member concerning measures affecting the operation of GATT 1994 taken within the territory of the former.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXIV

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXIV

1. Paragraphs 1 and 2: “customs territory”

Under Article XXIV:1, each separate customs territory on behalf of which the General Agreement is applied is “treated as though it were a contracting party”, and thus the most-favoured-nation clause of Article I:1 and the non-discrimination requirements of Article XIII:1, which apply as between contracting parties, apply as between each separate customs territory even if it is under common sovereignty with another customs territory. For example, the records of the London session of the Preparatory Committee indicate that in 1946 the various territories under French sovereignty in the French Union included some colonies treated as part of the metropolitan customs territory of France, and others which constituted separate customs territories. The historical preferences accorded within the French Union were provided for under Article I:2 in the case of the latter, by listing them in Annex B of the General Agreement.¹ In 1955, certain territories were deleted from Annex B because on 1 January 1948 they had been raised to the status of French départements and thenceforth formed part of the metropolitan customs territory.² See the discussion below in Section III concerning the background of the provisions in Article XXIV on customs territories. See also the material under Article XIV:3 in this Index.

The records of the Havana Conference indicate that the phrasing of paragraph 1 was changed from “customs territories of the Members” to “metropolitan customs territories of the Members and to any other customs territories in respect of which this Charter has been accepted ...” in order to avoid the implication that the customs territories of colonies were necessarily part of the customs territory of the metropolitan state.³ A proposal to change the definition of “customs territory” in paragraph 2 to substitute “substantially all” for “a substantial part” was rejected.⁴

Paragraph 3 of the accession protocol of Switzerland provides: “For the purposes of the territorial application of this Protocol, the customs territory of Switzerland shall be deemed to include the territory of the Principality of Liechtenstein as long as a customs union treaty with Switzerland is in force.”⁵ On 29 March 1994, Liechtenstein succeeded to contracting party status under Article XXVI:5(c). See also statements concerning the application of the General Agreement with respect to certain customs territories in accession protocols e.g. of Japan⁶, Portugal⁷ and Spain⁸.

In the earlier years of the GATT, the Secretariat periodically issued lists of the countries and territories where the General Agreement was effective, but this practice was abandoned after 1969.⁹ More recent supplements of the BISD list the contracting parties to the GATT and countries where the GATT is applied on a de facto basis.

See also material on territorial application of the General Agreement under Article XXVI:5.

2. Paragraph 3: “frontier traffic”

Sub-paragraph 3(a) is worded almost identically to the original United States proposal, which was explained by the US at the London session of the Preparatory Committee as follows:

“Paragraph 2(a) [XXIV:3(a)] referred to facilities for frontier traffic, in cases where a frontier ran through a city etc.; ... The area affected by this provision was usually limited to a distance of 15 kilometres from the frontier.”¹⁰

In discussions during the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, “it was agreed that ‘frontier traffic’ should not be defined too narrowly as it varied in each case and that the Organization would have, if necessary, to decide.”¹¹

The Report of a Working Party which examined and redrafted Article 42 of the Charter at the Havana Conference notes that “The proposal of the delegation of Italy requesting exemption from the most-favoured-nation clause for a special regime between Italy and the Free Territory of Trieste, was subsequently altered to refer only to advantages accorded to trade with Trieste by contiguous countries. The Working Party decided it could accept this modified proposal on condition that trade advantages thus accorded were not contrary to the terms of the Italian Peace Treaty”.¹²

The Report of the Sub-Committee of the Havana Conference which examined Articles 16 and 42 of the Havana Charter (corresponding to Articles I and XXIV of the General Agreement) notes as follows: “The Sub-Committee discussed with the delegate of Italy the latter’s proposal to except the special regime existing between the Republic of Italy and the Republic of San Marino and the State of the Vatican City from the provisions of paragraph 1 of Article 16. The Sub-Committee was of the opinion that the special arrangements existing between Italy and these two territories were not contrary to the Charter ...”.¹³

The Decision of 21 June 1951 on the Accession of Germany provides that “The CONTRACTING PARTIES ... agree that, notwithstanding the provisions of Article I of the General Agreement the accession of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany will not require any modification in the present arrangements for, or status of, intra-German trade in goods originating within Germany”.¹⁴

The Report of the Review Session Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration” notes that a proposal by the German delegation to add to Article XXIV:3(a) a reference to “specific frontier zones specially designated by treaty” was unsuccessful because the Working Party considered it unnecessary: “While the CONTRACTING PARTIES would no doubt wish to examine the terms of any particular treaty in the event of a dispute, the Working Party understands that traffic in zones designated in treaties between adjacent countries, designed solely to facilitate clearance at the frontier, would normally be covered by the phrase ‘frontier traffic’”.¹⁵

Introducing the provision in the proposed charter of the ITO in 1946, one negotiator stated that “customs unions were desirable, provided that they did not cause any disadvantage to outside countries, in comparison with their trade before the customs unions were effected ... this also was a standard clause in all commercial treaties”.¹⁶

Concerning the drafting of paragraph 4, see also under Section III below.

(1) Relationship between paragraph 4 and paragraphs 5 to 9

This issue was first discussed in depth during the examination of the Treaty of Rome establishing the European Economic Community. This examination was initially carried out at the Twelfth Session in 1957 by a Committee composed of all contracting parties, which appointed four sub-groups, the interim reports of which appear under the title of “The European Economic Community” in the Sixth Supplement of the BISD.¹⁷ The interim report of the sub-group on “Tariffs and Plan and Schedule” notes that “There was extensive discussion in the Sub-Group as to the significance to be placed upon paragraph 4 in the examination of the tariff provisions of the Rome Treaty. The representatives of the Governments of the Member States of the European Economic Community stated:

‘The terms of paragraph 4 on the one hand, and paragraphs 5 to 9 on the other hand must be interpreted interdependently. Paragraph 5 of Article XXIV starts with the word ‘accordingly’ which indicates beyond doubt the relationship which exists between these two sets of provisions. The conditions laid down in paragraphs 5 to 9 have the purpose of ensuring that customs unions or the free trade areas are in conformity with the general principle laid down in the second sentence of paragraph 4. In other words, a customs union or a free trade area which fulfil the requirements of the provisions of paragraphs 5 to 9 of Article XXIV would automatically and necessarily satisfy the requirements of paragraph 4 since paragraphs 5 to 9 merely spell out the implications of paragraph 4. This interpretation is confirmed by the records of the preparatory work related to the adoption of the text of the present Article XXIV.

‘The view expressed by certain contracting parties that the terms of paragraph 4 of Article XXIV require the Six to take into consideration the situation of each contracting party is furthermore in contradiction with the provisions of paragraph 5 et seq., particularly with those of paragraphs 5(a) and (b) which deal with the general incidence of tariff rates and commercial regulations.

‘The objective of paragraph 6 is furthermore the maintenance of the rights of the contracting parties acquired by concessions granted to them, a fact which should take care to a large extent of the problem of the countries the trade of which depends on one or a few products.’

“Most members of the Sub-Group were not prepared to accept this interpretation. They believed that paragraph 4 establishes the basic principles which a customs union should apply to be consistent with the objectives of GATT. Where questions arise as to the application of the provisions of paragraphs 5 to 9 in particular cases, such questions should be resolved in a manner consistent with the principles embodied in paragraph 4. Some members of the Sub-Group felt, furthermore, that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would have to verify whether the application of paragraphs 5 to 9 is consistent with the aims of a customs union as defined in paragraph 4. ...”¹⁸

The Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides in paragraph 1 thereof that “Customs unions, free-trade areas, and interim agreements leading to the formation of a customs union or free-trade area, to be consistent with Article XXIV, must satisfy, inter alia, the provisions of paragraphs 5, 6, 7 and 8 of that Article.”

(2) Free-trade areas between territories not producing the same products

The 1966 Working Party Report on “EEC - Association Agreements with African and Malagasy States and Overseas Countries and Territories” notes the statement of one member of the Working Party that “even if a free-trade area arrangement between developed and less-developed countries met all the more specific requirements of Article XXIV, it was unlikely, given that the parties to the Arrangement tended to produce entirely different products, to satisfy the general requirement of paragraph 4 of the Article that free-trade arrangements should be designed to create new trade between the parties and not to divert existing trade.” The representatives of the Community and the Associated States stated that “With regard to the general principle in paragraph 4 ... the precise wording of paragraph 5 ... made it abundantly clear that if the requirements of paragraphs 5 to 9 of Article XXIV were fulfilled, the Agreement was necessarily compatible with the principle set out in paragraph 4.”¹⁹

(3) “not to raise barriers to the trade of other contracting parties”

The Report of the Working Party on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” notes that “Some delegations expressed concerns which related to the introduction in Portugal and Spain of new quantitative restrictions some of which were discriminatory and inconsistent with Articles XI, XIII and XXIV:4” and also records the response by the representative of the European Communities that “Article XXIV:4 did not constitute an obligation but an objective and did not preclude members of a customs union from erecting barriers to trade if their overall incidence was less restrictive than the ones which had prevailed before the customs union was established".²⁰

The Report of the Working Party on the "Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States" notes the major concern of members with the provision in this Agreement that the Agreement would take precedence over the General Agreement unless otherwise provided therein. They questioned the possible implications for third parties and for the multilateral trading system. The representative of the United States stated that "In accordance with both paragraphs 4 and 5 of Article XXIV, the Canada-United States Free-Trade Agreement had not raised barriers to third-country trade either directly in the context of the phased-in implementation of the provisions of the Agreement or indirectly as a consequence of its negotiation".²¹ The representative of a group of countries said that "if the FTA was consistent with Article XXIV, it should have trade-creating effects for third parties".²²

(1) "as between the territories of contracting parties"

(a) Agreements between contracting parties and States or governments other than contracting parties

During the Havana Conference in 1948, France proposed to form a customs union with Italy, which was not a contracting party to the General Agreement at that time. In response to a proposal by France at the First Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Special Protocol replaced the original text of Article XXIV by the provisions of the corresponding articles of the Havana Charter. The Special Protocol entered into force on 7 June 1948. The Report of the Sub-Committee on Supersession at the First Session, which drafted the Special Protocol, notes that "The representative of France explained that acceptance of the Protocol by his Government would be contingent upon the agreement of the contracting parties to waive one of the obligations of paragraph 5 so as to enable France to proceed with the formation of a customs union with Italy without first requiring Italy to accede to the General Agreement".²³ The waiver was granted on 20 March 1948 so that the formation of the Franco-Italian customs union could proceed immediately.²⁴

The Working Party Reports of 1960 on "European Free Trade Association - Examination of Stockholm Convention"²⁵ and "Latin American Free Trade Area - Examination of Montevideo Treaty"²⁶ record diverging views as to whether paragraph 5 is applicable also to agreements with States or governments which are not contracting parties to GATT. The Report of the Working Party on "EEC - Agreements of Association with Tunisia and Morocco" contains the following paragraph.

"With regard to the first sentence of paragraph 5, one delegation pointed out that the term 'territories of contracting parties' did not cover the agreements with Tunisia and Morocco, the former having only provisionally acceded while the latter had as yet no relation with GATT. Attention was drawn by this delegation to the Havana Reports on Article 44 of the Charter, and in particular to paragraph 6 which corresponds to paragraph 10 of Article XXIV. It was understood that this paragraph 'will enable the Organization to approve the establishment of customs unions and free-trade areas which include non-members'. This interpretation had been confirmed by a decision in 1956 on the participation of Nicaragua in the Central American Free-Trade Area (BISD 5S/29). The representative of the parties to the agreements recalled that in other previous cases, notably in the cases of EFTA and LAFTA, some participants in those free-trade areas were not at that time contracting parties and some of them were still not. Accordingly, it had been shown in practice that the concept ‘territories of contracting parties’ had not been interpreted as restricting the applicability of paragraph 5.”²⁷

The 1985 Panel Report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, which has not been adopted, records the argument by the USA “that the procedures of Article XXIV:7(b) applied only to interim agreements among contracting parties and hence not to the agreements concluded with Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia, Jordan and Lebanon, which were not contracting parties. These agreements were rather subject to the procedures of Article XXIV:10 which required a two-thirds majority approval”.²⁸ The Panel findings contain the following paragraph.

“As regards the United States’ contention that a free-trade area including a non-contracting party can only be considered under the provisions of Article XXIV:10 and not under those of Article XXIV:7(b) the Panel noted that the CONTRACTING PARTIES had considered several such cases under the provisions of Article XXIV:7(b) (see EFTA: BISD 9S/20; LAFTA: BISD 9S/21; Arab Common Market: BISD 14S/20; UK/Ireland Free-Trade Area Agreement: BISD 14S/23).”²⁹

(b) Free trade areas between independent and dependent territories

The 1966 Working Party Report on “EEC - Association Agreements with African and Malagasy States and Overseas Countries and Territories” notes in its examination of the association between the EEC and certain countries and territories maintaining special relations with France and the Netherlands, that

“Some members of the Working Party felt that Article XXIV of the General Agreement was not meant to provide for free-trade areas between dependent and independent entities; one of these members added that some of the customs territories involved had no autonomy ... The representative of the Community recalled that Article XXIV:8 defines a free-trade area as a group of two or more ‘customs territories’ and the latter are defined in paragraph 2 of Article XXIV as ‘any customs territory with respect to which separate tariffs or other regulations of commerce are maintained for a substantial part of the trade of such territory with other territories’. He said this was the case with respect to the Associated Countries and Territories”.³²

(c) Free trade areas between developed and developing countries

The 1966 Report of the Working Party on “EEC - Association Agreements with African and Malagasy States and Overseas Countries and Territories” (on the “Yaoundé Convention”) notes the following exchange of views:

“Some members of the Working Party expressed the view that in a free-trade area consisting of industrialized and less-developed countries the industrialized countries should not require reciprocal advantages from their less-developed partners, and, in this connexion, referred to the principles established in the new Part IV of the General Agreement. ... In their view, Article XXIV had never been meant to apply to free-trade areas between developed and less-developed countries ...

³²L/2441, adopted 4 April 1966, 14S/100, 112-113, para. 35.

"In reply ... the representatives of the Community and the Associated States said that the question of reciprocity was not dealt with in Article XXIV, which only required that restrictions on substantially all the trade between the member countries of a customs union or a free-trade area should be removed. Part IV of the General Agreement ... did not aim to modify the provisions of Article XXIV. The only test the CONTRACTING PARTIES could apply to a free-trade area was whether it satisfied the requirements of Article XXIV. ... There was no reason to believe that the authors of Article XXIV had overlooked the possibility of free-trade areas between countries at different stages of development. The CONTRACTING PARTIES had moreover already examined free-trade areas where there had been a great difference between the stages of development of the constituent territories".³³

However, the 1976 Report of the Working Party on "The ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé" notes that "The parties to the Convention considered that the Convention was compatible with their obligations under the General Agreement, in particular the provisions of Articles I:2, XXIV and XXXVI, which had to be considered side by side and in conjunction with one another ... Since the objective of the Convention was to implement actions and measures aimed at improving standards of living and the economic development of less-developed countries, it could not but be in line with the objectives pursued by the GATT, in particular those defined in Part IV".³⁴ See also the material from this report at page 826 below.

(2) "the duties and other regulations of commerce imposed at the institution of any such union/maintained in each of the constituent territories"

(a) Variable levies

During the examination by the Working Party on the "Accession of Greece to the European Communities", Australia requested the establishment of a Panel of experts to determine "whether variable levies constitute 'duties and other regulations of commerce', and by what means the incidence of such measures should be calculated so as to reflect their effect on trade in a range of market circumstances".³⁵ The EEC response stated: "The Community view is that 'duties and other regulations of commerce' in the agricultural sector are unquestionably relevant to any examination of an agreement under Article XXIV:5(a), and we believe no contracting party could hold a contrary view. ... the Community view is that variable levies are covered by the phrase 'duties and other regulations of commerce'".³⁶ One member of the Working Party endorsed this position and stated that "This was a reversal of a position which the EEC had held since the introduction of their variable levy system and was one of the main issues which prevented progress being made in the previous Working Parties on the Rome Treaty and the 1972-73 enlargement".³⁷

(b) Quantitative restrictions

The Report of the Sub-Group at the Twelfth Session which examined the EEC Treaty provisions relating to quantitative restrictions notes:

"Most members of the Sub-Group could not accept the interpretation of the Six of paragraph 5(a). In their view the use of the term 'regulations' in this paragraph and in paragraph 8(a)(ii) does not include quantitative restrictions imposed for balance-of-payments reasons. An examination of the provisions of the Agreement indicates that the term 'regulations' is consistently used to describe such matters as customs procedures, grading and marketing requirements, and similar routine controls in international trade. This interpretation is reinforced by the fact that in 8(a)(i) the term 'regulation' is qualified by the word 'restrictive' in the one instance where Article XXIV specifically refers to the balance-of-payments Articles. Moreover, the term 'regulation' does not appear in the balance-of-payments Articles of the General Agreement. The General Agreement prohibits the use of quantitative restrictions for protective purposes and permits their use only in exceptional circumstances and mainly to deal with balance-of-payments difficulties.

³⁷L/5453, Report of the Working Party adopted on 9 March 1983, 30S/168, 187, para. 53.

Accordingly the notion that paragraph 5(a) would require that temporary quantitative restrictions should be treated in the same way as normal protective measures such as tariffs in determining the trade relations between countries in a customs union and third countries would be contrary to the basic provisions of the Agreement which preclude the use of quantitative restrictions as an acceptable protective instrument”.³⁸

The 1988 Report of the Working Party on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” notes the view of one member of the Working Party in relation to quantitative restrictions in Spain and Portugal stated to contravene Articles XI and XIII, that “because these measures were GATT-inconsistent they could not be included in the assessment of the incidence of changes in ‘other regulations of commerce’ which had to be carried out under Article XXIV:5(a)” and the view of some members of the Working Party that “measures which were inconsistent with the GATT could not be traded off against the alleged reduction of other barriers and could not be included in the assessment of incidence of changes in ‘other regulations of commerce’ required by Article XXIV:5(a) under which only GATT-consistent measures should be taken into account”.³⁹ The EEC observed in reply that “the Communities agreed that Article XXIV did not provide a waiver from other provisions of the GATT. By the same token, however, the role of the Working Party in this context was to examine the situation in the light of Article XXIV rather than with respect to any other provision such as Articles XI or XIII”.⁴⁰

(c) “Other regulations of commerce”

The Report of the Working Party of 1991 on “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” notes the statement of the United States representative concerning its customs user fee that “the customs user fee was an ‘other regulation of commerce’ covered under Article XXIV:5(b)” and the statement of another member that “Article XXIV, paragraph 5(b) did not stipulate that one FTA party could waive the application of ‘other regulations of commerce’, such as a customs user fee, with respect to the other party”. In response to a suggestion by one other member that the customs user fee should be more appropriately considered as “other restrictive regulations of commerce” that applied between the two FTA Parties in terms of Article XXIV:8(b), the representative of the United States said that “the customs user fee could not be qualified as ‘restrictive regulation of commerce’ in the way it was presently applied by his country”.⁴²

(d) Rules of origin

The Working Party Reports of 1973 on the EEC Agreements with various countries of the European Free Trade Association each contain similar exchanges of views on rules of origin in the context of a free-trade area agreement.⁴⁴ Each of these reports provides:

“One member of the Working Party said that ... the Agreement was contrary to the General Agreement because the rules of origin would frustrate the purpose of a free-trade area as stated in Article XXIV:4 in that they would frustrate intra-trade in products that could not meet the origin criteria and raise barriers to third-country trade in intermediate products; the requirements of Article XXIV:8(b) for elimination of restrictions on substantially all the trade had not been met because of [inter alia] the effects of the rules of origin; the requirement of Article XXIV:5(b) that external restrictions shall not be higher than in the constituent territories had not been met because of the rules of origin ... As well as being restrictive in many substantive provisions, those rules of origin were so complex and cumbersome as to be a barrier to trade in and of themselves; in the absence of compelling reasons to the contrary, manufacturers within the free-trade area would favour origin sources over outside countries merely to be sure of qualifying under the rules of origin. Once trade shifts of that kind took place, the damage to third countries’ exports would be difficult to remedy.”⁴⁵

“In the view of the parties the General Agreement offered no objective measure for evaluating rules of origin. Contracting parties were therefore free, within the framework of Article XXIV and consistent with the objective of establishing a free-trade area, to adopt systems which met their needs and those of third countries. ...”⁴⁶

The 1974 Report of the Working Party on “EEC Agreement with Egypt” notes that some members “found the rules of origin in the present Agreement, like those in similar agreements examined in earlier working parties, almost excruciatingly complex and difficult to explain. It was difficult to imagine why the parties would put themselves to so much trouble to draw up rules that hopefully would not represent increased barriers to third parties’ trade”.⁴⁷

The 1978 Report of the Working Party on “Agreement between the EC and Algeria” notes the view of one member of the Working Party “that the stringent rules of origin provided for in the Agreement would result in components being largely sourced in the EEC, even if that were more expensive for the Algerian manufactures. ... if substantial processing in Algeria were the only guarantee of real development, he asked why an exception had been granted for components produced in the EEC member States”. The spokesman for the EC noted that “while the General Agreement provided for rules of origin, it did not define any criteria in regard to them; like the needs of the parties, they could differ according to the case, consistently with the economic and commercial requirements of each context”.⁴⁸

The 1980 Report of the Working Party on “Agreement between the EFTA Countries and Spain” records the view of some members of the Working Party that “the strict rules of origin in the Agreement would limit the scope of free trade in a manner inconsistent with the requirements of Article XXIV:8(b) and would raise barriers to the trade of third countries contrary to the obligations of Article XXIV:5(c)”. stated that “rules of origin ... were necessary in a free-trade arrangement. The purpose of the rules was to prevent deflection of trade and not to limit the scope of free trade nor create obstacles to third country exports”.⁴⁹

The 1991 Report of the Working Party on “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” notes that “The parties to the FTA recognized that the purpose of rules of origin for goods in a free-trade agreement was solely to determine whether a product was eligible to benefit from preferential treatment under the agreement”.⁵⁰ One member of the Working Party stated that “In operating the provisions of the FTA on rules of origin, parties should bear in mind the provisions of Article XXIV:4 and Article XXIV:5(b), which clearly stipulated that barriers to the trade of other contracting parties with free-trade areas should not be raised and that any new regulations of commerce shall not be more restrictive than those existing prior to the formation of free trade areas. The compatibility of the rules of origin in the FTA with GATT should be examined in the light of these criteria. The representative of Canada said that the discussion of the question of whether rules of origin were one of ‘other regulations of commerce’ in terms of Article XXIV:5(b) had not led to a solution in previous working parties on free trade agreements. Rules of origin for the FTA would operate so as not to have adverse effects on the trade of third parties”.⁵¹

The use of rules of origin in the context of agreements notified under Article XXIV is discussed also in various other Working Party reports.⁵²

(3) “shall not on the whole be higher or more restrictive than the general incidence of the duties and regulations of commerce applicable in the constituent territories”

(a) “on the whole”

It was stated at the London session of the Preparatory Committee, in response to a question whether the new tariff rate on each product had to be below the average of the rates of the constituent territories prior to the formation of the union, that “The phrase ‘on the whole’... did not mean that an average tariff should be laid down in respect of each individual product, but merely that the whole level of tariffs of a customs union should not be higher than the average overall level of the former constituent territories”.⁵³

(b) “the general incidence”

The text of the Geneva Draft Charter (and the General Agreement as of 30 October 1947) used the words “the average level” in Article XXIV:2(b) instead of the words “the general incidence”. The report of the Sub-Committee at the Havana Conference which considered the Charter provision notes as follows:

“The Sub-Committee recommended that the words ‘average level of the duties’ be replaced by ‘general incidence of the duties’ in paragraph 2(a) of the new Article. It was the intention of the Sub-Committee that this phrase should not require a mathematical average of customs duties but should permit greater flexibility so that the volume of trade may be taken into account”.⁵⁴

The change was incorporated into Article XXIV; see Section III below.

The Report of the Sub-group at the Twelfth Session which examined the EEC Treaty provisions relating to the establishment of a common tariff notes:

“In considering the basis on which the CONTRACTING PARTIES could best make a judgement with regard to the common tariff in the light of provisions of paragraph 5(a) of Article XXIV, most of the members of the Sub-Group felt that an automatic application of a formula, whether arithmetic average or otherwise, could not be accepted, and agreed that the matter should be approached by examining individual commodities on a country by country basis. Attention was also drawn to the drafting history of paragraph 5(a) of Article XXIV, according to which the term ‘general incidence of the duties’ was used with the intention ‘that this phrase should not require a mathematical average of customs duties but should permit greater flexibility so that the volume of trade may be taken into account’.

“The representatives of the Member States drew attention to the fact that the provisions of Article XXIV do not exclude any method of calculation for the preparation of a common tariff, provided however that the duty rates applied as a result of the establishment of a customs union are not on the whole higher than the general incidence of the duties which they replace. The Member States base their calculation on the arithmetical average method which is strictly in conformity with the provisions of paragraph 5 of Article XXIV. For arriving at a still lower tariff level the Member States furthermore in their calculation use the rates actually applied on 1 January 1957, subject to the exceptions as provided for in Article 19 of the Treaty, and not the legal and contractual rates which the Member States, in their view, would have the right to apply under the provisions of paragraph 5 of Article XXIV. To the same effect the Member States provided ceiling rates for a great number of products which have to be applied even in instances where the arithmetical average would lead to higher rates ... The Member States are not in a position to accept a country-by-country study for the reasons ... given in connexion with the interpretation of paragraph 4 of Article XXIV”.⁵⁵

The 1983 Working Party Report on “Accession of Greece to the European Communities” records the views of the EEC that “Article XXIV:5 of the GATT referred to ‘the general incidence’, viz. the incidence of the trade régime of the enlarged EC on all of their partners”;⁵⁶ and (concerning the methodology for evaluating the incidence of measures) that “Article XXIV:5 required only a generalized, overall judgement on this point”;⁵⁷ and that “Article XXIV:5 dealt with the general incidence of the effects of the creation of a customs union ... particular implications for a contracting party with respect to individual products should be discussed in another forum”.⁵⁸ The Working Party could not agree on the precise methodology for the assessment to be made in terms of Article XXIV:5 and could not agree on whether the duties or regulations of commerce were, on the whole, higher or more restrictive after Greek accession than before.

The 1988 Report of the Working Party on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” records the view of the EC that “Article XXIV:5 only required an examination on the broadest possible basis. The task was general, namely to reach a view on whether the general incidence of customs duties and regulations after enlargement was on the whole more or less restrictive than before. Even if a negative incidence were shown to be the case for certain items, such as when duties were increased or replaced by variable levies, one had to consider whether these effects were not balanced by the effects of other changes in the tariff sector taken as a whole ... In assessing general incidence, one had to avoid too static an analysis and to take into account the trade-creating effects of the establishment or enlargement of a customs union”.⁵⁹ The same Report also notes that one member “could not accept the Communities’ contention that the extension of the tariff of the EC/10 to the EC/12 was compatible with their obligations under Article XXIV:5(a) regardless of the effect on the tariffs of Spain and Portugal. Article XXIV:5(a) required a comparison with the pre-accession tariffs of the constituent territories and the relative size of those territories was not a relevant factor”.⁶⁰

The Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides in paragraph 2 thereof that “The evaluation under paragraph 5(a) of Article XXIV of the general incidence of the duties and other regulations of commerce applicable before and after the formation of a customs union shall in respect of duties and charges be based upon an overall assessment of weighted average tariff rates and of customs duties collected. This assessment shall be based on import statistics for a previous representative period to be supplied by the customs union, on a tariff-line basis and in values and quantities, broken down by WTO country of origin. The Secretariat shall compute the weighted average tariff rates and customs duties collected in accordance with the methodology used in the assessment of tariff offers in the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations. For this purpose, the duties and charges to be taken into consideration shall be the applied rates of duty. It is recognized that for the purpose of the overall assessment of the incidence of other regulations of commerce for which quantification and aggregation are difficult, the examination of individual measures, regulations, products covered and trade flows affected may be required.”

(c) “applicable”: use of bound or applied duty rates in comparison of tariff rates

The Report of the Tariff Negotiations Committee in 1961 charged with examining the common external tariff of the EEC in the light of the provisions of Article XXIV:5(a) noted that its conclusions were “necessarily tentative” since “it was not able to reach agreement on one question which materially affects any attempt to compare tariff rates of the Member States of the EEC before its formation and the Common Tariff, i.e. the question whether, in the case of the former, legal or bound rates on the one hand, or, on the other, rates actually applied should be used”. It further noted:

“The European Economic Community held, on the basis of the text itself of paragraph 5 of Article XXIV, that the expression ‘applicable’ must be read, in contrast to the term ‘imposed’ used elsewhere in Article XXIV, as referring to a rule of law which is applied or capable of being applied, and that it is for each contracting party constituting a customs union or a free-trade area to interpret its own legislation with regard to the duties which should be regarded as being applicable. According to the national legislation of the member States of the EEC the term ‘applicable’ can only refer to conventional (bound) and legal customs duties. Several members of the Working Party, on the other hand, held that ‘applicable’ must in this context mean rates actually applied since the purpose of Article XXIV:5(a) was to prevent the institution of a customs union being used as an opportunity to increase the protective duties actually encountered by exporters. In particular it was held by these delegations that the use as a basis for the computation of the Common Tariff of tariffs which were in fact never levied (i.e. the Italian tariff) did not give a true indication of the protective regime existing before the formation of the customs union”.⁶¹

In discussion of this report the Executive Secretary stated that “the result of any statistical exercise would only support the view, with which he thought there was no disagreement, that the incidence of the Common Tariff was higher than that of the rates actually applied by the Member States at the time of the entry into force of the Treaty of Rome”.⁶² In 1962 a legal opinion was requested of the Executive Secretary. The opinion notes that “There appears to be very little recorded history on the drafting of paragraph 5(a). ... In the English language texts ... the word ‘applicable’ was used consistently. In the French language texts, on the other hand, there was some alternation between the two expressions ‘applicables’ and ‘en vigueur’; in the Havana Charter and in the General Agreement, in the final French texts drawn up in 1948, the word ‘applicables’ was used, but during the review of the GATT at the Ninth Session in 1955, this was changed (by means of the Protocol of Rectification to the French text) to ‘en vigueur’. Thus drafting history throws no light on the choice of words which were used and no definition of them has been provided.

⁶²C/M/8, p. 6.

"In these circumstances one must explore the probable intentions of those who drafted the provisions of Article XXIV. It is clear, in the light of the general principle set out in paragraph 4 of Article XXIV, that the drafters were seeking to ensure that the creation of a customs union, as an exception to the most-favoured-nation rule, would not in practice lead to a raising of barriers to international trade. ... the words (in paragraph 5(a)) 'shall not on the whole be higher than the general incidence of duties ... applicable in the constituent territories prior to the formation of [a customs] union ...' must be understood as an effort to spell out the implications of paragraph 4 and to satisfy the requirements of that paragraph.

"... the intent of those who drafted the provisions governing the establishment of a common external tariff of a customs union was that the formation of such a union should not, on the whole, result in higher tariff barriers against trade than existed previously in the constituent territories of the union.

"Against this background of the purposes and intent of paragraph 5(a) the two different interpretations of the word 'applicable'... should be examined. It seems that the intentions of the drafters are not fully covered by either interpretation, and yet when the two interpretations are reconsidered from the point of view of reasonableness and logic the gap between them narrows. On the one hand, if the word were interpreted in the sense of 'applied' duties, it would be reasonable, in the computation of a common external tariff, to permit the use of the duties inscribed in the tariff in those cases where duties had been temporarily lowered or suspended to meet particular circumstances of an economic nature or because other types of barriers were being used. On the other hand, if the word were interpreted in the sense of 'applicable' duties, it would be reasonable, in the computation of a common external tariff, to disallow the customs duties of a legal tariff if these duties had never actually been applied and there was no reasonable expectation that they ever would be applied".⁶³

The Report of the Working Party on the "Accession of Greece to the European Communities" notes that "Several members of the Working Party took the view that since it was the task of the Working Party under Article XXIV:5(a), inter alia, to make an assessment of the changes in the tariff level of Greece, it was necessary to obtain information not only relating to the bound or legal rates but also to the applied rates The spokesman for the EC replied that for the purposes of the Working Party, only the bound rates were of relevance".⁶⁴

The 1991 Report of the Working Party on the "Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States" notes (in relation to the elimination of Canadian duty remission schemes conditional on export performance) that

"The representative of Canada said that the objective of not raising barriers to the trade of other parties in Article XXIV:4 had to be considered together with the requirements of Article XXIV:5(b). Any judgement on the restrictive effect of eliminating [this] ... scheme ... should be made with respect to trade in goods with bound tariff rates. Parties to a free-trade agreement did not have the obligation to continue, regardless of the GATT bound rates, the duties applied at lower rates than GATT bound rates through duty remission schemes or temporary reduction or suspension of duties prior to the formation of the free-trade agreement. The representative of a group of countries noted with interest that the parties' interpretation of Article XXIV was that the obligation not to increase the restrictiveness of duties related exclusively to bound rates. One member maintained the view that the term 'duties' in Article XXIV:5(b) was not only limited to bound rates but covered all the duties applied by the parties at the time of the formation or the enlargement of a free-trade agreement".⁶⁵

The Report also records the view of the parties to the Agreement that: "With respect to concerns expressed about duty drawback and duty remission provisions in the Agreement they questioned whether it was the intent of Article XXIV to bind parties never to increase m.f.n. rates of duty which, at the time of entry into force of the FTA, had been suspended or subject to exoneration in some way".⁶⁶

Paragraph 2 of the Understanding on Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994, concerning evaluation of the formation of a customs union, provides that “The Secretariat shall compute the weighted average tariff rates and customs duties collected in accordance with the methodology used in the assessment of tariff offers in the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations. For this purpose, the duties and charges to be taken into consideration shall be the applied rates of duty”.

d) Other issues concerning methodology for comparison of duty rates

The 1988 Report of the Working Party on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” records the extensive debate in the Working Party concerning the use of the trade coverage approach (favoured by the EEC) and the “duties collected” approach (favoured by certain other delegations) in analysing changes in duty rates.⁶⁷ The same Report also notes the statement of one member, which was not agreed to by the EEC, that “exclusion of preferential trade was necessary when making the Article XXIV:5(a) assessment of the impact of accession”.⁶⁸ See also the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994.

(4) “any interim agreement ... shall include a plan and schedule for the formation of such a customs union or of such a free-trade area”

The 1965 Report of the Working Party on “Association of Turkey with the European Economic Community” notes the view of the EEC and Turkey that

“the fact that Article XXIV:5 uses the words ‘interim agreement’ indicates rather clearly that the ‘plan and schedule’ need not necessarily be detailed and complete; the CONTRACTING PARTIES have examined other regional agreements which were also somewhat imprecise in this respect”.⁶⁹

In the Report of the Working Party on “European Economic Community - Agreements of Association with Tunisia and Morocco” which examined these agreements in 1970, it was stated that

“without a precise and complete plan and schedule, it would be impossible for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make findings with regard to whether the agreements were likely to result in free-trade areas within a reasonable period and, if necessary, to make recommendations”.⁷⁰

The Report of the Working Party of 1975, on “Agreement between the EEC and Lebanon” records the statement by the EEC

“that Article XXIV:5 must be read in its entirety. The parties’ view, shared by some other members of the Working Party, was and remained that the three concepts of ‘interim agreement’, ‘plan and schedule’ and ‘reasonable length of time’ could not be dissociated from one another as to their significance and their scope. They could not claim to be able to foresee, in an interim agreement, in any precise manner at this stage and in a situation constantly changing, all the modalities that would lead to its objective.

“It nevertheless remained that, within the context of the Agreement, there was a plan and a schedule in the sense that the Agreement contained specific concrete provisions for attaining the objectives of tariff and quota dismantlement in a first stage, and the provisions necessary for continuing such dismantlement in accordance with the stated will of the parties to achieve a free-trade area within the meaning of Article XXIV and in compliance with the provisions of the General Agreement. Some members reminded the Working Party that their authorities did not share this interpretation and said that the parties should, in any event, provide reference dates so that contracting parties could judge for themselves whether the time period was reasonable in their view”.⁷¹

The Report of the Working Party of 1980 on “Agreement between the EFTA Countries and Spain” records the view of the parties to this agreement

“that a study of the practice of GATT showed that the borderline between the two legal concepts of free-trade agreement and interim agreement was not quite distinct”.⁷²

The 1984 Report of the Working Party on “Australia/New Zealand Closer Economic Relations Trade Agreement (ANZCERT)” notes that the New Zealand representative emphasized that “the Agreement was in no sense provisional or incomplete but a definitive establishment of a free trade area under Article XXIV, paragraph 7(a). There was, however, an intervening period between entry into force and the complete elimination of duties and other restrictive regulations on substantially all the trade”.⁷³

The Report of the Working Party on the “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” records that “one member was unable to take a definitive position on the consistency of the Agreement with Article XXIV:5(c) because of the absence of a clear plan and schedule for the elimination of certain non-tariff barriers in agricultural products ...”.⁷⁴

See also the discussion on “plan and schedule” in various other Working Party reports.⁷⁵

Paragraph 10 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV provides that “Should an interim agreement notified under paragraph 7(a) of Article XXIV not include a plan and schedule, contrary to paragraph 5(c) of Article XXIV, the working party shall in its report recommend such a plan and schedule. The parties shall not maintain or put into force, as the case may be, such agreement if they are not prepared to modify it in accordance with these recommendations. Provision shall be made for subsequent review of the implementation of the recommendations.”

(5) “within a reasonable length of time”

During discussions at the London session of the Preparatory Committee a South African proposal to replace the ambiguous term “reasonable” by a definite time limit was not taken up.⁷⁶

The 1962 Working Party on “Association of Greece with the European Economic Community” notes that “Some members of the Working Party expressed concern about the length of the transitional period provided for by the Association Agreement. Article 15 of this Agreement stipulated, for a number of products covering a relatively large percentage of Greek imports (30 percent of Greek imports from the EEC) a transitional period of twenty-two years. Doubt was expressed as to whether this could be considered a reasonable length of time for the realization of the customs union”.⁷⁷

The Report of the Working Party on “European Economic Community - Agreement with Spain” records that the parties to that Agreement noted that the meaning of the term “reasonable length of time”, which must be appreciated in conjunction with that of “interim agreement”, had never been defined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.⁷⁸

The 1972 Report of the Working Party on “EEC - Agreement of Association with Malta” records that:

“Most members of the Working Party stated that paragraphs 5-9 of Article XXIV had to be interpreted against the background of paragraph 4. ... From the point of view of the General Agreement an evolutionary time-table, such as the one presented in this Agreement, was preferable to a precise and detailed schedule in the case of countries with different levels of development. Such a time-table might be more likely to lead to the formation of a customs union within a shorter period ...

“The parties to the Agreement ... stated - and several members of the Working Party supported them - that in view of the difference in stage of development of Malta and the Community, the provisions of the Agreement concerning the plan and schedule for the establishment of a customs union represented a realistic approach ... Paragraph 5(c) dealt expressly with the case of interim agreements. The very term ‘interim’ as applied to the notions of ‘plan and schedule’ and ‘reasonable length of time’ made it clear that they did not necessarily have to be fixed at the outset in an absolutely specific and detailed manner.

“One member of the Working Party could not accept the foregoing interpretation of Article XXIV, pointing out that ... the text of paragraph 5(c) was very clear and unequivocal”.⁷⁹

The 1972 Report of the Working Party on “European Economic Community - Agreement of Association with Turkey”, which examined an Additional Protocol and Interim Agreement concluded in 1970 and 1971 pursuant to the Ankara Agreement examined in 1964, records the views of Turkey that “[t]he modalities and time period for the formation of a customs union [between developed and developing countries], while remaining consistent with Article XXIV of the General Agreement, must take into consideration the special conditions of the developing countries concerned, for their development and well-being were essential objectives of the same General Agreement, and in particular Part IV thereof”⁸⁰ and that “no determination of what constituted a reasonable length of time had been made by the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.⁸¹

The Report of the Working Party on “Agreement between the European Communities and Israel” records that

“a member of the Working Party noted the parties’ viewpoint that there was nothing in Article XXIV to prevent the time-table for the fulfilment of the reciprocal obligations being phased differently if the parties so agreed. His authorities considered that such a different phasing could be a legitimate matter for concern, especially if the difference were substantial. The representative of Israel did not share this view, especially in the light of the Tokyo Declaration and the need for differential measures providing special and more favourable treatment for developing countries. He said that, in the present instance, the parties’ different stages of economic development made the phasing appropriate and compatible with both the letter and the spirit of the General Agreement”.⁸²

The Report of the Working Party on the Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States notes as follows.

“Several members had doubts about the temporary nature of the measures which allowed re-imposition of duties on fresh fruit and vegetables over a period of twenty years and which did not set out a time period for the phasing out of Canadian import permits for grain and grain products. They questioned the consistency of these provisions with Article XXIV:5(c). ... The representative of the United States said that ... this provision would not have the effect of frustrating the ultimate objective of eliminating tariff restrictions between the two parties in a certain time frame The parties to the FTA considered that

[these provisions] were applied as a type of emergency clause and therefore met the requirements of Article XXIV.”⁸³

“With regard to the requirement referred to in paragraph XXIV:5(c) that free-trade areas be formed ‘within a reasonable length of time’, the Working Party noted that the plan and schedule for the elimination of tariffs in the Agreement did not exceed the time period of ten years. Furthermore, bilateral emergency actions (Article 1102) allowing the suspension of reductions in duty or a return to m.f.n rates of duty would be limited to the transition period However one member was unable to take a definitive position on the consistency of the Agreement with Article XXIV:5(c) because of the absence of a clear plan and schedule for the elimination of certain non-tariff barriers in agricultural products, in particular the existence of a twenty-year snapback provision for fresh fruit and vegetables (Article 702) and the indefinite time-frame allowing the imposition of restrictions on grain and grain products (Article 705).”⁸⁴

See also the discussion in various Working Party reports concerning “reasonable length of time”⁸⁵ and the references to the powers of the CONTRACTING PARTIES below under paragraph 7 of Article XXIV.

Paragraph 3 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides that “The ‘reasonable length of time’ referred to in paragraph 5(c) of Article XXIV should exceed 10 years only in exceptional cases. In cases where Members parties to an interim agreement believe that 10 years would be insufficient they shall provide a full explanation to the Council for Trade in Goods of the need for a longer period”.

5. Paragraph 6

The present paragraph 6 of Article XXIV emerged from the initiative of France at the First Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES at Havana in 1948, to immediately replace the original text of Article XXIV by the text of the corresponding articles of the Havana Charter in order to accommodate the customs union agreement that had been signed between France and Italy. In discussions at the First Session, the representative of the United States stated that “he would have to give further study to the position of bound rates of duty in the event of formation of a customs union”; the representative of France stated that “he would have no objection to providing some procedure whereby an injured party could seek a satisfactory adjustment or compensation; he mentioned in this connection the formula provided in Article XXIII and in Article XXVIII”.⁸⁶ The Report of the Sub-Committee on Supersession at the First Session, which recommended the replacement of Article XXIV, notes that “in connection with paragraph 5(a) of Article XXIV, the Sub-Committee discussed the question of increases in bound rates of duty which might arise from the provision that the duties imposed at the institution of a customs union are not to be on the whole higher than the general incidence of the duties previously applicable in the constituent territories. This question was referred to the delegates of France and the United States who were asked to submit recommendations”. The report of these two delegations recommended an addition to paragraph 5(a) which became the present paragraph 6.⁸⁷

(1) “the procedure set forth in Article XXVIII shall apply”

(a) Application of Article XXVIII procedures

Paragraph 10 of the 1980 Guidelines on “Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII”⁸⁸ provides that these procedures are in relevant parts also valid for renegotiations under Article XXIV:6.

The 1988 Working Party Report on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” notes the statement of one member of the Working Party that “The exclusion of preferential trade was necessary ... for the purpose of determining supplier rights in the negotiations conducted under Article XXIV:6”.⁸⁹

The 1990 Award by the Arbitrator on “Canada/European Communities - Article XXVIII Rights” discusses, inter alia, the Article XXVIII rights of Canada dating from Article XXIV:6 negotiations Canada concluded with the Community on 29 March 1962 and the agreements on quality and ordinary wheat concluded between the parties on the same day. The Award notes as follows:

“... it is appropriate to give weight to the generally accepted proposition that the right to withdraw concessions is an integral part of the right to negotiate, which right is not in dispute here. It is worth recording that Article XXIV:6 itself specifies that in the negotiations required by Article XXIV ‘the procedures set forth in Article XXVIII shall apply’. There can be no doubt that here the procedures include the right to withdraw concessions”.⁹⁰

Paragraph 4 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides that “Paragraph 6 of Article XXIV establishes the procedure to be followed when a Member forming a customs union proposes to increase a bound rate of duty. In this regard Members reaffirm that the procedure set forth in Article XXVIII, as elaborated in the guidelines adopted on 10 November 1980 (BISD 27S/26-28) and in the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of GATT 1994, must be commenced before tariff concessions are modified or withdrawn upon the formation of a customs union or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a customs union”.

(b) Conciliation and arbitration

In October 1963 a panel was established at the request of the EEC and the US “to render an advisory opinion to the two parties concerned in order to determine: on the basis of the definition of poultry provided in paragraph 02.02 of the Common Customs Tariff of the European Economic Community, and on the basis of the rules of and practices under the GATT, the value (expressed in United States dollars) to be ascribed, as of 1 December 1960, in the context of the unbindings concerning this product, to United States exports of poultry to the Federal Republic of Germany”. The unbindings in question had taken place pursuant to Article XXIV:5(a). The Panel determined the appropriate reference period, adjusted the figures for that period to take into account discriminatory quantitative restrictions existing in the Federal Republic of Germany during that period, and assessed what the United States could reasonably have expected that the value of its exports would have been in the reference period had there been no discriminatory quantitative restrictions.⁹¹ See further under Article XXVIII.

In 1974 Canada could not reach an agreement with the EEC in Article XXIV:6 negotiations in connection with the accession to the Communities of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom. A Panel was established under paragraphs 1(c) and 2 of Article XXIII upon Canada’s request, “to investigate whether the entry into force of Schedules LXXII and LXXIIbis maintains the general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions between Canada and the European Communities, not less favourable to trade than that provided for in Schedules XL, XLbis, XIX, XXII and LXI; the investigation would not be limited to statistical or quantitative tests but would take account of the broader economic elements as is customary in Article XXVIII negotiations”.⁹² The Panel was not activated because the parties reached an agreement which resulted in a Joint Declaration.⁹³

In July 1987 Argentina, supported by a number of delegations, requested establishment of a panel under Article XXIII:2, stating that the EEC had “insisted on applying incorrect methods in calculating compensation (global balance) which are not consistent with Article XXIV:6 of the General Agreement”.⁹⁴ The matter was not pursued.

At the special meeting of the Council in October 1988 to review developments in the trading system, the Director-General informed the Council that in April 1988, Canada and the EC had asked him, with reference to paragraph 8 of the 1979 Understanding, to render an advisory opinion on whether a tariff concession granted by Portugal to Canada in 1961 was applicable to wet salted cod. This issue had arisen in tariff negotiations between Canada and the EC under Article XXIV:6. He had agreed on 15 April to render such an opinion and on 15 July had made it available to the two parties concerned.⁹⁵

(c) Application of Article XXVIII:3, including time-limits

See under Article XXVIII:3.

(2) “compensatory adjustment”

(a) Methods of calculation and negotiation

The 1988 Working Party Report on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” notes that one member of the Working Party

“... construed the concept of ‘compensatory adjustment’ in Article XXIV:6 as implying that a tariff reduction on one item in some constituent territories of the customs union should be taken into account in calculating the amount of compensation for the increase in the tariffs applied to the same item in other constituent territories of the same customs union. It was therefore opposed to the view that ‘compensatory adjustment’ implied that the amount of compensation should be estimated on the basis of the aggregate change in tariff levels applying to all items, including those not subject to concession”.⁹⁶

Paragraph 5 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides that “These negotiations will be entered into in good faith with a view to achieving mutually satisfactory compensatory adjustment. In such negotiations, as required by paragraph 6 of Article XXIV, due account shall be taken of reductions of duties on the same tariff line made by other constituents of the customs union upon its formation. Should such reductions not be sufficient to provide the necessary compensatory adjustment, the customs union would offer compensation, which may take the form of reductions of duties on other tariff lines. Such an offer shall be taken into consideration by the Members having negotiating rights in the binding being modified or withdrawn. Should the compensatory adjustment remain unacceptable, negotiations should be continued. Where, despite such efforts, agreement in negotiations on compensatory adjustment under Article XXVIII as elaborated by the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of GATT 1994 cannot be reached within a reasonable period from the initiation of negotiations, the customs union shall, nevertheless, be free to modify or withdraw the concessions; affected Members shall then be free to withdraw substantially equivalent concessions in accordance with Article XXVIII”.

(b) “Reverse compensatory adjustment”

A Communication from the Commission of the European Communities of 11 January 1973, in connection with the accession to the Communities of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom, proposed that contracting parties consider that the concessions then bound in Schedules XL and XLbis were the concessions offered for application to the customs territory of the enlarged Community subject to adjustments in tariff quotas, and stated: “The Communities consider that under the provisions of Article XXIV they have no obligation to extend to the enlarged Communities the concessions formerly granted by the six-State Communities. Having regard to this consideration, the Communities consider that the concessions they are offering are greater than any compensation which might result for third countries from the provisions of Article XXIV:6".⁹⁷

The 1988 Working Party Report on "Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities" notes that one member of the Working Party

"... rejected the European Communities' view that as a corollary of 'compensatory adjustment', a customs union could claim 'counter-compensation' from other contracting parties for the reduction of the general incidence of customs duties resulting from the customs union, since this concept was utterly without foundation in the GATT".⁹⁸

Paragraph 6 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides that "GATT 1994 imposes no obligation on Members benefiting from a reduction of duties consequent upon the formation of a customs union, or an interim agreement leading to the formation of a customs union, to provide compensatory adjustment to its constituents".

(c) Effect of Article XXIV:6 negotiations

The 1989 Panel Report on "EEC - Payments and Subsidies paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins" examined, inter alia, the effect of the substitution of EEC Schedules, after successive Article XXIV:6 negotiations as a result of Community enlargement, on non-violation nullification or impairment claims of contracting parties with respect to concessions in those Schedules.

"The first issue the Panel examined in this context was ... whether the benefits accruing to the United States under the tariff concessions on oilseeds presently in force include the protection of expectations that prevailed in 1962 when the tariff concessions on oilseeds were originally incorporated in the Schedule of Concessions of the Community. ...

"The Panel concluded ... that the answer to the question of whether the expectations of 1962 continue to be protected depends on whether the concessions on oilseeds resulting from the subsequent renegotiations under Article XXIV:6 were part of a new balance of concessions or whether the reinstatement of the concessions at the same rate after the successive enlargements of the Community meant that the balance of concessions originally negotiated in 1962 was to be continued. The Panel noted that the result of the initial Article XXIV:6 negotiations of the Community in 1962 was the creation of a Schedule of Concessions for its common external tariff that had replaced the tariffs of the six founding member States. In these negotiations, the trading partners of the Community compared the benefits accruing to them under the previous tariff concessions of the individual member States with the benefits accruing to them under the common external tariff in the whole territory of the Community. The result of the Article XXIV:6 negotiations following the successive enlargements of the Community was not the creation of a new common external tariff but the extension of the existing tariff concessions of the Community to the new member States.⁹⁹ On the occasion of these negotiations pre-existing concessions of the Community were renegotiated as well but such modifications remained exceptional. Except where such modifications were specifically renegotiated, the partners of the Community could confine themselves to comparing the benefits accruing to them under the previous tariff concessions of the new member States with the benefits accruing to them as a result of the application of the Community's tariff concessions by the new member States. They had no reason to proceed to a global reassessment of the value of all the Community's concessions in the whole of the Community's territory.

⁹⁸L/6405, adopted on 19-20 October 1988, 35S/293, 315, para. 38.

⁹⁹The footnote to this sentence refers to "Article XXIV:6 Negotiations: Communication from the Commission of the European Communities", document L/3807 dated 11 January 1973; "Negotiations Under the Provisions of Article XXIV:6: Communication from the Commission of the European Communities", document TAR/16 dated 20 May 1981; "Enlargement of the European Economic Community: Accession of Portugal and Spain", document L/5936, Add.2 and Third Geneva (1987) Protocol, Schedule LXXX.

“In these circumstances, the partners of the Community in the successive renegotiations under Article XXIV:6 could legitimately assume, in the absence of any indications to the contrary, that the offer to continue a tariff commitment by the Community was an offer not to change the balance of concessions previously attained. The Panel noted that nothing in the material submitted to it indicated that the Community had made it clear to its negotiating partners that the withdrawal and reinstitution of the tariff concessions for oilseeds as part of the withdrawal of the whole of the Community Schedule meant that the Community was seeking a new balance of concessions with respect to these items. There is in particular no evidence that the Community, in the context of these negotiations, offered to compensate its negotiating partners for any impairment of the tariff concessions through production subsidies or that it accepted compensatory tariff withdrawals by its negotiating partners to take into account any such impairment. The balance of concessions negotiated in 1962 in respect of oilseeds was thus not altered in the successive Article XXIV:6 negotiations. The Panel therefore found that the benefits accruing to the United States under the oilseed tariff concessions resulting from the Article XXIV:6 negotiations of 1986/87 include the protection of reasonable expectations the United States had when these concessions were initially negotiated in 1962”.¹⁰⁰

6. Paragraph 7

(1) “Any contracting party ... shall promptly notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES”

(a) Notification of agreements under Article XXIV

The Council Decision of 25 October 1972 on procedures for the examination of customs unions and free-trade areas provides that

“The Council notes that Article XXIV:7(a) of the General Agreement requires that any contracting party deciding to enter into a customs union or free trade area or an interim agreement leading to the formation of such a union or area, shall promptly notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

“Without prejudice to the legal obligations to notify in pursuance of Article XXIV, the Council decides to invite contracting parties that sign an agreement falling within the terms of Article XXIV, paragraphs 5 to 8, to inscribe the item on the agenda for the first meeting of the Council following such signature, to the extent that the advance notice of ten days prescribed for inclusion of items on the agenda can be observed. Inclusion of the item should allow the Council to determine the procedures for examination of the agreement”.¹⁰¹

(b) Procedures for examination of agreements under Article XXIV

The examination of agreements under Article XXIV has been conducted in working parties established for that purpose; such working parties have generally commenced with an exchange of written questions and answers concerning the agreement under examination.

The Report in 1949 of the Working Party on “The South Africa-Southern Rhodesia Customs Union”, which was the first Working Party ever to examine an agreement under Article XXIV, notes that

“It was suggested at the meeting of the CONTRACTING PARTIES when the working party was appointed that its terms of reference might include an examination of the procedure to be established for the implementation of Article XXIV. The working party discussed this question and reached the conclusion that consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of proposals for customs unions would have to be based on the circumstances and conditions of each proposal and, therefore, that no general procedures can be established beyond those provided in the article itself”.¹⁰²

¹⁰²GATT/CP.3/24, adopted on 18 May 1949, II/176, 181, para. 20.

During the discussion of this report, it was stated that “each case should be considered on its own merits. The case under consideration could not create a precedent because no two cases had the same characteristics”. It was also submitted that “to establish precedents was clearly against the spirit of Article XXIV”.¹⁰³

The Report of the Working Party on “Association of Greece with the EEC”

“... stressed that the sum of the conditions prevailing in Greece was unique to Greece and that the present Agreement was not a precedent for possible future association agreements between other countries and the European Economic Community. The Working Party considered that in any event, because of differing economic factors, each agreement for association would have to be considered, in the context of GATT, entirely on its own merits”.¹⁰⁴

The Report of the Working Party on “EEC - Agreement of Association with Turkey” records the view that “as acknowledged by prior working parties, these association agreements had to be considered on a case-by-case basis and in their own context”.¹⁰⁵

Paragraph 7 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides that “All notifications made under paragraph 7(a) of Article XXIV shall be examined by a working party in the light of the relevant provisions of GATT 1994 and of paragraph 1 of this Understanding. The working party shall submit a report to the Council for Trade in Goods on its findings in this regard. The Council for Trade in Goods may make such recommendations to Members as it deems appropriate”.

c) Periodic reporting

At the end of the Twenty-seventh Session in 1971, the CONTRACTING PARTIES instructed the Council to establish a calendar fixing dates for the examination, every two years, of reports on regional preferential agreements.¹⁰⁶ However, no such calendar has been fixed since 1987.

At the Twenty-Fifth Session in 1968, the representative of the EEC stated that since 1 July 1968 the customs union had been fully achieved, and the Community did not anticipate submitting further reports on the formation of the customs union.¹⁰⁷ At the February 1970 Council meeting, the EEC cited its notification that on 1 January 1970 the Common Market had completed its transitional period of existence and entered the definitive stage, and “this Customs Union is now complete in accordance with the criteria laid down in Article XXIV”¹⁰⁸ and stated that the Community would no longer submit annual reports on the development of its customs union. The Chairman in his summing-up noted that he had consulted on this matter with delegations and had come to the conclusion that it would be wiser not to pursue an examination of the legal issues involved; he noted as well that “such a decision was without prejudice to the legal rights of all contracting parties under Article XXIV, so that it was open to any contracting party to raise on the agenda of the Council or on the agenda of the CONTRACTING PARTIES any specific matter arising under Article XXIV in relation to the Community”.¹⁰⁹

The Report of the Working Party on “Australia/New Zealand Closer Economic Relations Trade Agreement (ANZCERT)” also records the view of the representative of Australia that “consistent with past GATT practice, the parties would be prepared to submit a report biennially to the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the operation of the Agreement. They would, however, see no need to continue this reporting once the full free trade area had been finally established”.¹¹⁰

Paragraph 11 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides that “Customs unions and constituents of free-trade areas shall report periodically to the Council for Trade in Goods, as envisaged by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to GATT 1947 in their instruction to the GATT 1947 Council concerning reports on regional agreements (BISD 18S/38), on the operation of the relevant agreement. Any significant changes and/or developments in the agreements should be reported as they occur”.

(2) “the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall make recommendations”

(a) Powers of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under paragraph 7

It was stated during discussions on the General Agreement at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee that

“there is no question of the [CONTRACTING PARTIES] ... having any power to approve or disapprove a Customs Union ... if a country which is a Member of this Agreement enters into an arrangement with another country ... which involves preferential arrangements which are not consistent with its obligations under Article I, and justifies that departure from its obligations on the ground that it is a step toward a Customs Union, then the contracting parties should have a chance to have a look at those proposals and see whether they are in fact as represented. If the [CONTRACTING PARTIES] find that the proposals made by the country that is making them will in fact lead towards a Customs Union in some reasonable period of time, why they must approve it. They have no power to object. It is simply a mechanism foreseeing, if necessary, that some Member does not find a way out of its obligations under Article I under the guise of entering into a Customs Union when it is really not likely that a Customs Union will eventuate”.¹¹²

The Report of the Working Party on “EEC - Agreement with Spain” contains the following paragraph:

“Members of the Working Party noted that paragraph 7(b) stipulated that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should make recommendations to the parties to a free-trade agreement if they found that the Agreement was not likely to result in the formation of a customs union or a free-trade area within the period contemplated by the parties to the Agreement or the period foreseen for the formation of free-trade area was not a reasonable one. In the absence of a specific time period for achieving that purpose, it was obviously impossible in the case under discussion to judge its reasonableness. Hence the CONTRACTING PARTIES were deprived of one of the important safeguard provisions incorporated in Article XXIV”.¹¹³

Paragraphs 7 through 10 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provide as follows:

“... The Council for Trade in Goods may make such recommendations to Members as it deems appropriate.

“In regard to interim agreements, the working party may in its report make appropriate recommendations on the proposed time-frame and on measures required to complete the formation of the customs union or free-trade area. It may if necessary provide for further review of the agreement.

“Members parties to an interim agreement shall notify substantial changes in the plan and schedule included in that agreement to the Council for Trade in Goods and, if so requested, the Council shall examine the changes.

“Should an interim agreement notified under paragraph 7(a) of Article XXIV not include a plan and schedule, contrary to paragraph 5(c) of Article XXIV, the working party shall in its report recommend such a plan and schedule. The parties shall not maintain or put into force, as the case may be, such agreement if they are not prepared to modify it in accordance with these recommendations. Provision shall be made for subsequent review of the implementation of the recommendations”.

(b) Practice under paragraph 7

In the early years of GATT, the examination of agreements notified under Article XXIV:7 was sometimes concluded by the adoption of a Declaration or Decision. See, for instance, the Declaration of 18 May 1949 on “The Customs Union Agreement between the Governments of the Union of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia”, in which

“Declare that the Governments of the Union of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia are entitled to claim the benefits of the provisions of Article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade relating to the formation of customs unions;

“Request the Governments of the Union of South Africa and Southern Rhodesia to instruct the Customs Union Council to include in each annual report a definite plan and schedule of the steps to be taken during the ensuing twelve months towards the re-establishment of the said union; and

“Decide to review the above declaration if, after study of reports and plans submitted by the two Governments, they find at any time that the Interim Agreement is not likely to result by 1 April 1959 in the establishment of a customs union in the sense of Article XXIV”.¹¹⁴

Since that time, the examination of agreements notified under Article XXIV:7 has almost never led to a unanimous conclusion or a specific endorsement by the CONTRACTING PARTIES that all the legal requirements of Article XXIV had been met and that the parties to the agreement in question could claim the benefits of Article XXIV. The exceptions are the customs union between the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic; the Caribbean Community and Common Market (CARICOM); the Caribbean Free Trade Agreement; and the El Salvador-Nicaragua Free Trade Area and the Participation of Nicaragua in the Central American Free Trade Area. In the case of the Ireland-United Kingdom Free Trade Agreement the conclusions stated that no recommendations were being made under Article XXIV: 7.¹¹⁵

In the Twelfth Session, the CONTRACTING PARTIES examined the Treaty Establishing the European Economic Community in a Committee composed of all contracting parties, which appointed four sub-groups. The report of the Committee notes that “the sub-group reports contained no definite conclusions, because either the time at the disposal of the sub-groups or the information available did not permit such conclusions to be drawn”.¹¹⁶ Further consideration of questions relating to the Treaty was conducted in the Intersessional Committee and at the Thirteenth Session, where “After giving further consideration to the continuation of their examination of the Rome Treaty the CONTRACTING PARTIES arrived at the following conclusions:

“(a) As many contracting parties considered that because of the nature of the Rome Treaty there were a number of important matters on which there was not at this time sufficient information to enable the CONTRACTING PARTIES to complete the examination of the Rome Treaty pursuant to paragraph 7 of Article XXIV, this examination and the discussion of the legal questions involved in it could not usefully be pursued at the present time.

- “(b) This postponement would clearly not prejudice the rights of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXIV.
- “(c) The CONTRACTING PARTIES welcomed the readiness of the members of the EEC to furnish further information pursuant to paragraph 7(a) of Article XXIV as the evolution of the Community proceeded.
- “(d) The CONTRACTING PARTIES noted that procedures for consultations under Article XXII had been agreed upon and were being applied in connexion with questions arising out of the application of the Rome Treaty.
- “(e) The CONTRACTING PARTIES also welcomed the willingness of the members of the EEC to furnish in Article XXII consultations information as to the measures arising out of the application of the Treaty.
- “(f) The CONTRACTING PARTIES noted that the other normal procedures of the General Agreement would also be available to contracting parties to call in question any measures taken by any of the six countries in the application of the provisions of the Rome Treaty, it being open of course to such country to invoke the benefit of Article XXIV insofar as it considered that this Article provided justification for any action which might otherwise be inconsistent with a provision or provisions of the General Agreement”.¹¹⁷

Similar phrasing was also used in some other conclusions adopted on regional trade agreements.¹¹⁸

In some cases the CONTRACTING PARTIES have granted a waiver or special exception. In other cases, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted conclusions which note, inter alia, that “the CONTRACTING PARTIES do not at this juncture find it appropriate to make recommendations to the parties to the Treaty pursuant to paragraph 7(b) of Article XXIV”.¹¹⁹ There are also cases where the CONTRACTING PARTIES took note of the interim arrangement and “invited” submission of “a sufficiently comprehensive plan and schedule”.¹²⁰

At the November 1992 Council in discussion of the Report of the Working Party on “Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement”, the Chairman of the Working Party noted that “Over fifty previous working parties on individual customs unions or free-trade areas had been unable to reach unanimous conclusions as to the GATT consistency of those agreements. On the other hand, no such agreements had been disapproved explicitly. ... he noted that some reservations expressed in the examination of the Canada-United States Agreement, as well as of earlier agreements, had been concerned primarily with possible future effects of the agreements. This suggested that greater reliance might be placed on a review of how such agreements were actually implemented”.¹²¹

(c) Legal status of agreements in the absence of recommendations

The Report of the Working Party on the “Accession of Greece to the European Communities” records the view of one member of the Working Party that “the compatibility of the Treaty of Rome itself with the provision of the General Agreement remained an open question since the Working Party which had examined the Treaty had not reached any final conclusions in this regard. Similarly, the compatibility of the 1973 enlargement with the General Agreement had also remained unresolved as that Working Party had not issued a final report”.¹²² The EC responded that it “did not share the view that these earlier treaties constituted an open question or that their legal status was unresolved in GATT since the CONTRACTING PARTIES had formulated no recommendations under Article XXIV:7(b) for any modifications to those arrangements. It was, however, always possible for any country to seek to resume discussions of these questions in another more appropriate context”.¹²³

During discussions in the Council concerning establishment of the Panel on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, one delegation “expressed disagreement with the interpretation that in not rejecting the agreements, the CONTRACTING PARTIES had accepted them. He referred to the reports of the Working Parties which had examined the EEC agreements with Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia respectively. It had been stipulated in those reports that some members of the Working Parties had held the view that it was doubtful that these agreements were entirely compatible with the requirements of the General Agreement. ... Moreover, the reports of the Working Parties which had examined the agreements of Malta, Cyprus and Israel respectively, all indicated that some members held views on these agreements similar to the view expressed above. ... In at least one specific case, members reserved their rights under the General Agreement”.¹²⁴

The 1985 Panel report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, which has not been adopted, includes the following findings:

“The Panel noted that at the time of the examination of the agreements entered into by the European Community with certain Mediterranean countries, there was no consensus among contracting parties as to the conformity of the agreement with Article XXIV:5. ...”¹²⁵

“... The Panel considered that, in effect, the CONTRACTING PARTIES had withheld judgment at that time as to the conformity of the agreements with the requirements of Article XXIV. The agreements had not been disapproved, nor had they been approved. The Panel found therefore that the question of the conformity of the agreements with the requirements of Article XXIV and their legal status remained open. ...”¹²⁶

With regard to the applicability of Article XXIII:

“... The Panel noted that the absence of a pertinent decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES did not create a legal vacuum. In fact the decision had to be considered as pending and could therefore be taken at any time in the future ... At this stage, on the multilateral level, the status of the agreements had to be considered as still undetermined”.¹²⁷

The Panel concluded, inter alia, that:

“Given the lack of consensus among contracting parties, there had been no decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the conformity with Article XXIV of the agreements under which the EC grants tariff preferences to certain citrus products originating from certain Mediterranean countries, and therefore the legal status of the agreements remained open”.¹²⁸

During the discussion of this Panel report in the GATT Council, this Panel finding was criticized by some contracting parties which stated, inter alia, that “Article XXIV agreements had to be presumed to be in conformity with the General Agreement as long as the CONTRACTING PARTIES had not made a recommendation on them”.¹²⁹

Article XXIV relating to customs unions, free-trade areas or interim agreements leading to the formation of a customs union or free-trade area”.

7. Paragraph 8

(1) “duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce ... are eliminated”

(a) “regulations of commerce”

The Report of the 1970 Working Party on “EEC - Association with African and Malagasy States” records the view of some members of the Working Party that “the regulations of commerce in question should be interpreted in relation to Articles I:1 and III of the General Agreement”.¹³²

(b) Charges on imports other than customs duties

The Report of the 1970 Working Party on “EEC - Association with African and Malagasy States” records the view of some members of the Working Party that “free trade within the meaning of Article XXIV:8(b) did not exist” in view of the continued imposition by certain parties to the Yaoundé Convention of fiscal charges on imports from other members, and that “an alternative approach should ... be sought, ... namely the Generalized System of Preferences”.¹³³

“The representatives of the parties to the Convention ... noted that, so far as they knew, the elimination of fiscal charges had never yet constituted an element necessary for recognition that a free-trade area was consistent with the GATT rules. ... The General Agreement made a clear-cut distinction between measures which had a protective effect and other measures applied in like manner to domestic and imported products. The rules and obligations in that respect were very clearly defined in Article III. It was evident that the provisions of Article XXIV concerning the concept of a free-trade area concerned only protective measures. The taxes referred to were of a fiscal character, not protective, and did not differ from similar taxes applied by other contracting parties. It was in any case unacceptable that developing countries should be denied the right to impose a general fiscal tax, and be deprived of one of the main sources of income when the imposition of such taxes was a normal and accepted practice in all other countries including contracting parties which were members of regional arrangements already examined in the GATT”.¹³⁴

The same differences of view are recorded in the Report of the Working Party on “EEC - Association with Certain Non-European Countries and Territories”.¹³⁵

The Report of the Working Party on “EEC - Agreement of Association with Malta” notes that one member stated that “If after entering a customs union Malta were to retain essentially the same level of charges on imports from all sources as presently existed in the Maltese tariff, but redefined as revenue duties, his delegation wondered how it could be said that trade was free of duties; in his view this would not be consistent with the intent of the General Agreement as regards the establishment of customs unions”.¹³⁶ In response,

“The parties to the Agreement denied the validity of this interpretation concerning revenue duties in relation to the application of Article XXIV. There was nothing in the General Agreement to prohibit the levying of revenue duties, which indeed represented an essential source of revenue for developing economies. The freedom of action of any contracting party in the application of its fiscal policy was not limited by the General Agreement except where its direct or indirect protective effects might be detrimental to a concession. In the face of the provisions of Article XXIV, the existence of revenue duties, which by definition ruled out discriminatory application, could not be regarded as jeopardizing the establishment of free trade. Such an interpretation would be tantamount to denying the benefit of the provisions of Article XXIV and the economic integration desired by those who framed it to practically all countries, developing countries in particular. In the present instance, the objective of the parties to the Agreement was to institute free trade among them and to establish a customs union involving the adoption by Malta of the Common Customs Tariff of the Community. Those were strictly the only points to be taken into consideration in the face of the provisions of Article XXIV.

“One member of the Working Party ... stressed that there was no obligation to eliminate non-protective revenue duties on goods traded between members of a customs union or a free-trade area.

“The discussion brought to light the fact that the English and French versions of Article XXIV paragraph 8(a) differed inasmuch as the English text referred only to ‘duties’, whereas the French text referred to ‘droits de douane’ (customs duties). The Working Party did not reach any conclusion on the point”.¹³⁷

The Report of the Working Party on “EEC - Agreement of Association with the United Republic of Tanzania, the Republic of Uganda and the Republic of Kenya” notes the view of the parties to this Agreement that the fiscal entry charges levied by these African countries were not “duties or other regulations of commerce” within the meaning of Article XXIV.¹³⁸ This view was challenged by other members of the Working Party.

The Report of the Working Party on the “Free-trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” notes that “In response to a suggestion by one other member that the customs user fee should be more appropriately considered as ‘other restrictive regulations of commerce’ that applied between the two FTA parties in terms of Article XXIV:8(b), the representative of the United States said that the customs user fee could not be qualified as ‘restrictive regulation of commerce’ in the way it was presently applied by his country”.¹³⁹

See also the discussion of this issue in various other Working Party reports and documents.¹⁴⁰

(c) Duties in the context of free-trade areas between market economy and centrally-planned economy countries

During discussion of the free-trade area agreements between Finland and Hungary, Finland and Bulgaria, and Finland and Czechoslovakia at the February 1975 meeting of the Council, the representative of the United States stated that “Article XXIV of the GATT was intended to permit the creation of free-trade areas by the removal of duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce. He wondered how this was to be achieved in the case of countries where duties had a nominal or at most a limited effect on trade, while other restraints on commerce played a more significant role”. He further expressed “doubt that the criteria and intent of Article XXIV could be met by agreements between market and non-market economy countries which essentially dealt only with the removal of duties”.¹⁴¹

The Reports of the Working Parties on the examination of the agreements concluded by Finland with Czechoslovakia¹⁴², the German Democratic Republic¹⁴³, Hungary¹⁴⁴ and Poland¹⁴⁵ record divergent views as to the applicability of Article XXIV to such agreements. The 1977 Working Party Report on “Agreement between Finland and Hungary” notes that “Some members of the Working Party considered that all agreements concluded under Article XXIV should be examined in the same manner but with regard to agreements involving a centrally-planned economy State-trading country and a market economy or a mixed economy country, they considered that serious and novel questions were raised which merited serious consideration, although this did not mean that they took the position that such agreements could not under any circumstances comply with the requirements of Article XXIV. Accordingly, they would be interested in determining whether the customs tariff alone influenced trade flows between the parties”.¹⁴⁶ The 1980 Working Party Report on “Agreement between Finland and Poland” notes that one member of the Working Party stated that “he could not accept any approach that would question a priori the compatibility of the Agreement with the provisions of the General Agreement, on the basis that the parties to the Agreement were of different economic and social systems”.¹⁴⁷

(d) Quantitative restrictions

The Report of the Sub-group of the Committee on the “European Economic Community” which examined the provisions of the EEC Treaty relating to quantitative restrictions notes that most members of the Sub-Group “could not accept the term ‘other regulations of commerce’ in 8(a)(ii) included quantitative restriction. Moreover they pointed out that if paragraph 8(a)(ii) were interpreted to require a common level of quantitative restrictions against third countries, this would be incompatible with the explicit permission in paragraph 8(a)(i) for the use of quantitative restrictions within the system for balance-of-payments reasons since it would appear not to be practicable to have a common level of quantitative restrictions against third countries in a situation where countries within the customs union made use of their right to impose such restrictions against their partners. Moreover, the effect of such an arrangement would be that some country or countries in the union would be imposing quantitative restrictions not required by their own individual balance-of-payments position and would, therefore, be raising barriers to trade with other contracting parties”.¹⁴⁸

The Report of the Working Party on the “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” notes with respect to the retention of import quotas on eggs and dairy products by Canada that “one member said that the provisions of Article XXIV:8(b) did not give open-ended permission to maintain quantitative restrictions”.¹⁴⁹ In the case of the reciprocal exemptions from meat import laws granted by each party, one member “wished to know the legal basis on which such restrictions vis-à-vis third countries could be justified; and on which the party taking the action could exempt exports of the other party from the quantitative restrictions if it was those exports which were causing injury”.¹⁵⁰

(2) “except, where necessary, those permitted under Articles XI, XII, XIII, XIV, XV and XX”

Article 44 of the Havana Charter, from which this provision was taken, refers to “except, where necessary, those permitted under Section B of Chapter IV and under Article 45”.

The Report of the Sub-group of the Committee on the “European Economic Community” which examined the consistency with Article XXIV of the EEC Treaty provisions for the association of overseas territories records the view of some members that “paragraph 8(b), in derogation of the rule regarding the elimination of internal obstacles, made provision for certain restrictive trade regulations authorized under certain Articles of the General Agreement; the list of these did not, however, include Article XVIII, concerning governmental assistance to economic development. The application of the customs duties and of the restrictions instituted under Article XVIII did not therefore benefit from the exception for which provision was made in Article XXIV. The latter did not make provision for allowing one constituent territory of a free-trade area, in order to protect its industry, to levy import duties on imports from another constituent territory”.¹⁵¹

The EEC member States responded that

“the Rome Treaty did not make any legal use of Article XVIII. Furthermore, the argument which had been drawn a contrario from the fact that Article XVIII was not one of those referred to in Article XXIV:8(b) did not take into account the fact that Article XXI was not mentioned either. It would be difficult, however, to dispute the right of contracting parties to avail themselves of that provision which related, inter alia, to traffic in arms, fissionable materials, etc., and it must therefore be concluded that the list was not exhaustive”.¹⁵²

The Report of the Working Party on “European Free Trade Association and Association between EFTA and Finland - Accession of Iceland” records the view of certain members of the Working Party that “Article XXIV did not affect the obligation of contracting parties to apply quota restrictions in a non-discriminatory manner”.¹⁵³

The Report of the Working Party on “EC Agreements with Finland” records the view of the EEC and Finland that “Article XXIV:8(b), specifically mentioning Article XIII, was permissive in this respect and covered certain possibilities in relation to the maintenance of outward restrictive regulations of commerce in certain circumstances, while eliminating those between the parties to the Agreement”.¹⁵⁴

The 1988 Report of the Working Party on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” notes that “Several representatives wondered whether in the opinion of the European Communities, Article XXIV provided a derogation from the obligations arising out of other GATT provisions. The representative of the European Communities considered that Article XXIV applied in the light of other provisions of the GATT”.¹⁵⁵

The 1991 Report of the Working Party on “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” notes the view of one member that “if a party to a free-trade agreement invoked Article XX to justify an export licensing scheme for short supply or conservation purposes, it should apply such a measure in a non-discriminatory manner. ... Article XXIV:8(b) did not allow parties to a free trade agreement to exempt other parties from the measures taken under the exceptions provided in that article. Such measures could not be considered ‘other restrictive regulations of commerce’ in terms of Article XXIV:8(b). The representative of Canada said that under Article XXIV:8(b) of the GATT, restrictions meeting the exceptions of Article XX could be maintained in a free-trade agreement. Export control measures were included in ‘other restrictive regulations of commerce’ in this article. ... Article XXIV:8(b) ... did not preclude the parties to a free-trade agreement from undertaking elimination of restrictions vis-à-vis the other party to the agreement”.¹⁵⁶

The 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Denial of Most-favoured-nation Treatment as to Non-Rubber Footwear from Brazil” includes the following footnote:

“The Panel noted that Brazil had also mentioned the existence of other preferential arrangements -- specifically, free-trade arrangements between the United States and other contracting parties that would be covered by Article XXIV. However, the question of whether such Article XXIV arrangements can include non-tariff preferences has repeatedly been discussed but never resolved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. See, for example, the Report of the Working Party on the Accession of Iceland to EFTA, BISD 18S/174, 177. In any case, the Panel did not consider that the resolution of such an issue with respect to Article XXIV arrangements was necessary to the disposition of the case at hand.”¹⁵⁷

(3) “with respect to substantially all the trade”

(a) Quantitative criteria

The Report of the Sub-group of the Committee on the “European Economic Community” which examined the consistency with Article XXIV of the EEC Treaty provisions for the association of overseas territories notes that the EEC member States proposed the following definition of the term “substantially all”: “a free-trade area should be considered as having been achieved for substantially all the trade when the volume of liberalized trade reached 80 per cent of total trade”.¹⁵⁸

“Many members of the Sub-Group said that each case of a proposed customs union or free-trade area had to be considered on its merits and that it was, therefore, inappropriate to fix a general figure of the percentage of trade which could be subjected to internal barriers without running counter to the definition in paragraph 8(b) of Article XXIV. A matter to be considered was whether the provisions of a free-trade area pointed towards a gradual increase of barriers affecting the trade between the constituent parties or a gradual reduction of such barriers. Moreover, any calculation of the percentage of trade not freed from barriers would need to take account of the fact that this would be, or would have been, larger if the trade had been allowed to flow freely. Some members of the Sub-Group thought that it would be unrealistic to apply the same criterion to a free-trade area such as that existing between Nicaragua and El Salvador and to a free-trade area the members of which were highly industrialized countries accounting for a large percentage of world trade”.¹⁵⁹

The same Report reflects different views as to whether a quantitative assessment of the trade liberalization within the free trade areas between the European and the overseas territories should be based, as suggested by the EEC States, on the total volume of trade including the intra-European trade among the EEC States or, as suggested by other contracting parties, solely on the trade between the EEC as a whole and the associated overseas territories.¹⁶⁰

The Report of the Working Party on “European Communities - Agreements with Portugal” notes the view of the EEC “that no exact definition of the expression [‘substantially all the trade’] existed and that the precise figures would vary from case to case according to several factors. At any rate, percentages were established as a general indicator of the trade covered by the Agreement and were not to be regarded as a conclusive factor”.¹⁶¹

(b) Qualitative criteria and sectoral exclusions

The Report of the Working Party on the “European Free Trade Area - Examination of the Stockholm Convention” notes:

“The Working Party considered first whether the requirement relating to ‘substantially all the trade’ in Article XXIV:8(b) was met in the case of the Stockholm Convention. The view was put forward that, as the provisions of, inter alia, Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention relating to the elimination of barriers to trade in the free-trade area did not apply to trade in agricultural products, it could not be maintained that duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce were being eliminated on ‘substantially all the trade’. It was also contended that the phrase ‘substantially all the trade’ had a qualitative as well as quantitative aspect and that it should not be taken as allowing the exclusion of a major sector of economic activity. For this reason, the percentage of trade covered, even if it were established to be 90 per cent, was not considered to be the only factor to be taken into account.

“The member States agreed that the quantitative aspect, in other words the percentage of trade freed, was not the only consideration to be taken into account. Insofar as it was relevant to consider the qualitative as well as the quantitative aspect, it would be appropriate to look at the consistency of the Convention with Article XXIV:8(b) from a broader point of view and to take account of the fact that the agricultural agreements did facilitate the expansion of trade in agricultural products even though some of the provisions did not require the elimination of the barriers to trade. Moreover, insofar as both qualitative and quantitative aspects were concerned it was incorrect to say that the agricultural sector was excluded from the free-trade area; in fact barriers would be removed on one third of total trade in agricultural products between member States ...

“... The member States did not accept the contention that they should not take credit for the removal of barriers to trade on a product unless such barriers were removed by all the member States. In this connexion the drafting history of Article XXIV was important. The Article had been drafted against the background of the possibility of a free-trade area being established in Europe in which the United Kingdom, in particular, might wish to retain some barriers against certain imports from its partners mainly as a result of its preferential arrangements. It was envisaged, therefore, that an individual member of a free-trade area should have a certain latitude in respect of some products; this latitude would be permitted by the phrase ‘substantially all the trade’. In view of the preferential arrangements of the United Kingdom, there was an inference that this latitude would be used particularly with respect to agricultural products. It was important to note that the phrase used in Article XXIV was ‘substantially all the trade’ and not ‘trade in substantially all products’. Some members might wish to avail themselves of this latitude in respect of different products. The member States did not claim that free trade would be achieved in the case of all agricultural products, but they did consider themselves entitled to take into account the trade affected by the complete removal of barriers under the agricultural agreements for certain products when assessing the total amount of trade freed under the free-trade area arrangements. ...

“There was, therefore, a divergence of view regarding the justification for including, in estimating the amount of trade within the free-trade area to be freed from barriers in terms of Article XXIV, the trade in agricultural products where imports were freed in the case of one member State only. In the time at its disposal, the Working Party was unable to reach agreement concerning the interpretation which should be given to the relevant provisions of Article XXIV”.¹⁶³

Various other Reports of Working Parties on agreements presented under Article XXIV also include statements that the meaning of “substantially all the trade” had never been defined in GATT.¹⁶⁴ It was also stated that Article XXIV:8(b) had to be interpreted to mean free trade in all products and not carved out by sectors; the exclusion of a whole sector, no matter what percentage of current trade it constituted was contrary to the spirit of both Article XXIV and the General Agreement.¹⁶⁵

The Report of the Working Party on the “Free-trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” notes that:

“The Working Party generally recognized that, in terms of its coverage, this Agreement was one of the more comprehensive free-trade agreements examined in GATT so far. The Canada-United States Free-trade Agreement did not attempt to exclude the whole of the agricultural sector from its coverage. Nevertheless several members raised doubts as to consistency of the Agreement with the definition of a free-trade area in Article XXIV:8(b) and as to whether it covered ‘substantially all’ the trade between the parties. These members remained concerned about the exceptions allowing restrictions on trade between the two parties in a number of specific products. ... The representative of Canada pointed out that [certain of the measures cited] related to emergency arrangements for addressing any unforeseen developments in these sectors”.¹⁶⁶

The preamble of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT1994 provides, inter alia:

“Recognizing the contribution to the expansion of world trade that may be made by closer integration between the economies of the parties to such agreements;

“Recognizing also that such contribution is increased if the elimination between the constituent territories of duties and other restrictive regulations of commerce extends to all trade, and diminished if any major sector of trade is excluded”.

(c) Reverse preferences and one-way free-trade areas

The 1976 Report of the Working Party on “The ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé” notes the statement of the EEC that: “In the light of their development needs and the principles of Part IV of the General Agreement, the Community had not demanded reciprocity in its trade with the ACP”.¹⁶⁷ “The representative of the ACP countries stated that the Convention did not require them to grant reverse preferences. At the same time, Article 7 of the Convention accommodated a historical situation in which, prior to the enlargement of the EEC, some ACP countries granted preferences to the original six members of the EEC and others to the United Kingdom ... he would expect ACP countries progressively to eliminate those preferences which remained ...”.¹⁶⁸ However, the view of the parties to the Convention - “that the Convention was compatible with their obligations under the General Agreement, in particular the provisions of Articles I:2, XXIV and XXXVI, which had to be considered side by side and in conjunction with one another”¹⁶⁹ - was not shared by some other members of the Working Party.¹⁷⁰ The 1982 Report of the Working Party on “Second ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé” notes the statement of the ACP representative that “ACP countries were not obliged to give preferences to the EEC. Prior to the first Lomé Convention, a number of ACP countries had granted reverse preferences to the EEC. Since the Convention had been implemented, all States but two had eliminated such preferences”.¹⁷¹

The 1977 Report of the Working Party on “The Australia/Papua New Guinea Trade and Commercial Relations Agreement” provides:

“The representative of Australia stated that although Papua New Guinea would not be extending any reverse preferences to Australia under the Agreement, trade statistics showed that substantially all the trade was covered within the meaning of Article XXIV:8(b). It was pointed out in this connexion that Article XXIV did not contain any specific provision with respect to reverse preferences. The absence of reverse preferences in favour of Australia did not, in the view of his authorities, affect the free-trade area status of the Agreement.”¹⁷²

“Some members expressed doubts about the conformity of the Agreement with the provisions of Article XXIV, since it appeared that no reciprocal reduction of duties or elimination of other restrictive regulations of commerce by Papua New Guinea had been required. ... One member ... stated that he did not share the view expressed by the representative of Australia that, in the light of the fact that Article XXIV made no mention of reverse preferences, reciprocity was not required between the partners to free-trade area agreements.”¹⁷³

The 1977 Reports of the Working Parties on “Agreement between the EC and Algeria”, “Agreement between the EC and Morocco”, and “Agreement between the EC and Tunisia” each note that one member of the Working Party “welcomed the confirmation by the spokesman for the European Communities that the Agreement did not provide for reverse preferences and expressed his expectation that the Agreement would not contain such preferences in the future. He also expressed concern at the rules of origin, which might in several cases have the same effect as reverse preferences and deflect trade from lower cost suppliers, often at an increased cost to the developing country and thereby deflect scarce resources from other development needs”.¹⁷⁴

The 1984 Report on the “Application of the EEC-Algeria, EEC-Morocco, EEC-Tunisia, EEC-Egypt, EEC-Jordan, EEC-Lebanon and EEC-Syria Co-operation Agreements” contains the following communication by the parties to these agreements: “By virtue of the provisions of the agreements, the partners of the Community have not so far granted it any concessions in conformity with the principles of Part IV of the General Agreement”.¹⁷⁵

(4) “substantially the same duties and other regulations of commerce are applied ...”

In September 1978, the EEC notified the contracting parties concerning its change in the unit of account for specific duties in its common customs tariff other than those applied to certain agricultural products. While the specific duties had been expressed in terms of national currencies, the rates were converted to the European Unit of Account (EUA); as a result, the specific duties expressed in terms of certain national currencies (e.g. the German mark) would be lowered and those expressed in terms of other currencies (e.g. the Italian lira) would be raised. The notification stated that “the legal basis for this change derives from the entry into force on 1 April 1978 of the second amendment to the IMF Articles of Agreement”¹⁷⁸ and further stated:

“The alignment with the EUA of specific duties and other specific elements of the common customs tariff expressed in terms of national currencies does not fall within the provisions of either Article XXVIII of GATT or Article II:6, and is moreover consistent with the provisions of Article II:3.

“... the move toward standardization of the specific duties in the CCT, to be made on 1 January 1979, does not involve any modification or withdrawal of EEC concessions, since these have never been expressed in terms of the respective currencies of the member States. If the amounts in national currencies corresponding to the specific duties had been adjusted in proportion to their fluctuation away from the unit of account, as allowed under the provisions governing bindings, the result would be less favourable for contracting parties than that resulting from alignment with the EUA, because the latter is at a level lower than the EUA par value. Far from diminishing the value of EEC concessions, the [EUA] in fact implies a reduction of specific duties which the EEC, under the terms of its schedule of bindings, would be justified in applying in pursuance of Article II ... It is simply an up-dating operation comprising reductions and increases of specific duties expressed in terms of national currencies, so as in this way to ensure a return to a unified common customs tariff in accordance with the obligations established by Article XXIV:8(a)(ii). Nor is it a matter of an upward adjustment of specific duties following a monetary devaluation in excess of 20 per cent (Article II:6(a)), because the bindings concerned have never been expressed in terms of national currencies and the purpose of the alignment is not to offset a devaluation. Lastly, the alignment does not alter the method of converting currencies so as to impair the value of any concessions, and is thus consistent with the provisions of Article II:3 of the General Agreement”.¹⁷⁹

8. Paragraph 9: Historical preferences and customs unions or free-trade areas

The Interpretative Note Ad Paragraph 9 was rectified by the Third Protocol of Rectification, which entered into force on 21 October 1951, to meet a difficulty of Southern Rhodesia, which had a customs union with South Africa. At Havana “it had not been envisaged that the importing country might be one which granted the same preferential rate to the country of origin of the product as the re-exporting country and in that case the difference payable should be that between the duty already paid and the preferential rate”.¹⁸⁰

The Report of Sub-Group D on “Association of Overseas Territories” of the Committee which examined the Treaty Establishing the European Economic Community notes the following views of some members of the Sub-Group:

“Paragraph 9 of Article XXIV stipulated that the formation of a customs union or of a free-trade area should not affect the preferences authorized in paragraph 2 of Article I of the General Agreement; those preferences might, however, be eliminated or adjusted by means of negotiations, in particular the preferences of which the elimination was required to conform with the provisions of paragraph 8(a)(i) and paragraph 8(b). The association of the overseas territories provided for in the Rome Treaty ran counter to this rule since it strengthened the preferences referred to in paragraph 9 and established new preferences in favour of imports originating in the associated territories. ... Certain members pointed out that [the Interpretative Note Ad paragraph 9] indicated the course which should have been followed in order to link the preferential systems existing between Belgium, France and the Netherlands on the one hand, and the overseas territories, on the other, with the customs union provided for in the Treaty”.¹⁸¹

The 1966 Working Party Report on “EEC - Association Agreements with African and Malagasy States and Overseas Countries and Territories” notes regarding paragraph 9:

“The objection was made that resort to Article XXIV was merely a device to cover the situation arising out of the extension of preferences. Reference was made to the Note to paragraph 9 of Article XXIV ... The representative of the Community said that the Community was well aware of this rule and applied it under the Rome Treaty in respect of imports from third parties benefiting from preferences in the territory of one of the members of the Community. The rule did not, however, apply to the present case since the countries or territories which originally benefited from preferences were not members of the free-trade area and there was no longer any question of preferences in the sense of Article I”.¹⁸²

(1) Formation of customs unions and free trade areas with non-GATT contracting parties

As originally proposed, the Charter only provided for the formation of customs unions between Members. The provisions of paragraph 10 were added at the Havana Conference; the reports on discussions at Havana note that “a sixth paragraph was added to provide that the Organization may, by a two-thirds vote, approve proposals which do not fully comply with the requirements of the Article provided that they lead to the establishment of a customs union or a free-trade area in the sense of the Article. It was the understanding of the Sub-Committee that this new paragraph 6 will enable the Organization to approve the establishment of customs unions and free-trade areas which include non-Members”.¹⁸³ It was the view of those who favoured the insertion of the words “as between the territories of Members” in Article 44 that “this Article, including the new paragraph 6 ... would not prevent the formation of customs unions and free-trade areas of which one or more parties were non-Members but would give the Organization an essential degree of control”.¹⁸⁴ Paragraph 10 was added to the General Agreement when the original text of Article XXIV was replaced by the texts of the corresponding Havana Charter articles.

Free-trade areas including a contracting party and one or more non-contracting parties have been approved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in two instances: the Decision of 25 October 1951 on Free-Trade Area Treaty between Nicaragua and El Salvador¹⁸⁵ and the Decision of 13 November 1956 on participation of Nicaragua in the Central American Free-Trade Area.¹⁸⁶

(2) “by a two thirds majority”

In the corresponding paragraph of Article 44 of the Havana Charter, the voting rule reads “by a two thirds majority of the Members present and voting”. However, this rule was not brought into the General Agreement in 1948 when the original text of Article XXIV was replaced with the text of Charter Articles 42-44.¹⁹⁰ At the Review Session in 1954-55, a proposal to amend the rule to read “by a majority comprising two thirds of the contracting parties” was rejected.¹⁹¹

10. Paragraph 11: Arrangements between India and Pakistan

Paragraph 11 and its Interpretative Note were added to Article XXIV of the GATT in September 1947 at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee¹⁹² and a corresponding provision was added to the Charter at Havana, to respond to the particular situation of India and Pakistan as the partition of India and Pakistan had taken place on 10 August 1947. At the Review Session of 1954-55, the need for this provision was considered and it was retained at the request of the delegations of India and Pakistan.¹⁹³

11. Paragraph 12: “observance of the provisions of this Agreement by ... regional and local governments and authorities”

(1) Purpose and scope of paragraph 12

During the negotiation of the Charter and the General Agreement, the following justifications and explanations were given by delegations that suggested the inclusion of a “federal clause”. During the London session of the Preparatory Committee, Australia stated in connection with a proposed rule to prevent internal fiscal and regulatory discrimination against imported goods:

“Where the matter is one solely of action by a State, and our ‘external powers’ laws do not give the Commonwealth authority to act, we would agree to use our best efforts to secure modification or elimination of any practice regarded as discriminatory”.¹⁹⁴

The United States delegation stated with reference to a rule on discriminatory government procurement practices:

“The obligation to accord fair and equitable treatment in awarding contracts applied to both central and local governments where the central government was traditionally or constitutionally able to control the local government”.¹⁹⁵

The Report of the Sub-committee on Technical Articles noted that “Several countries emphasized that central governments could not in many cases control subsidiary governments in this regard, but agreed that all should take such measures as might be open to them to ensure the objective”.¹⁹⁶

During negotiation of the General Agreement at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, the United States rejected a proposal by China to change the language of Article XXIV:12 by pointing out:

“it is necessary to distinguish between central or federal governments, which undertake these obligations in a firm way, and local authorities, which are not strictly bound, so to speak, by the provisions of the Agreement, depending of course upon the constitutional procedure of the country concerned”.¹⁹⁷

At the Havana Conference, Mexico proposed an amendment under which federal States would have been fully responsible for actions by regional and local governments. The sub-committee which examined the proposal reported: “The Mexican amendment ... was withdrawn as certain delegates stated that their governments would encounter constitutional difficulties in attempting to enforce the provisions ... as drafted in the Mexican amendment”.¹⁹⁸

In the 1985 Panel report on “Canada - Measures Affecting the Sale of Gold Coins”, which has not been adopted:

“... the Panel considered that the purpose of Article XXIV:12 was to qualify the basic obligation to ensure the observance of the General Agreement by regional and local government authorities in the case of contracting parties with a federal structure...

“The Panel then examined whether Article XXIV:12 applies (a) to all measures taken at the regional or local level or (b) only to those measures which the federal government cannot control because they fall outside its jurisdiction under the constitutional distribution of competence. ...”.¹⁹⁹

¹⁹⁸E/CONF. 2/C. 6/48/Rev.1, p. 4.

¹⁹⁹L/5863 (unadopted, dated 17 September 1985), paras. 53-54.

The Panel examined the drafting history of Article XXIV:12 and then further noted:

“... This drafting history indicates, in the view of the Panel, that Article XXIV:12 applies only to those measures taken at the regional or local level which the federal government cannot control because they fall outside its jurisdiction under the constitutional distribution of competence.”²⁰⁰

“... The Panel considered that, if Article XXIV:12 is to fulfil its function of allowing federal States to accede to the General Agreement without having to change the federal distribution of competence, then it must be possible for them to invoke this provision not only when the regional or local governments’ competence can be clearly established but also in those cases in which the exact distribution of competence still remains to be determined by the competent judicial or political bodies. The Panel therefore concluded that Canada had to be given the benefit of the doubt and that Article XXIV:12 had to be deemed to be applicable to the Ontario measure.”

“The Panel then turned to the question of the legal consequences of the application of Article XXIV:12 to the Ontario measure. The Panel considered that Article XXIV:12 could be interpreted either (a) as limiting the applicability of the other provisions of the General Agreement or (b) as merely limiting the obligation of federal states to secure the implementation of these provisions.”²⁰¹

“The Panel proceeded to an evaluation of the relative merits of the two interpretations of Article XXIV:12. The Panel noted that Article XXIV:12 refers to the ‘observance’ of the provision of the General Agreement by local governments. Only a rule that applies to local governments can be ‘observed’ by them. This suggests that Article XXIV:12 was not meant to regulate the scope of application of the provisions of the General Agreement but merely the measures to secure their observance by local governments. The Panel further noted that Article XXIV:12 is an exception to the general principle that a party to a treaty may not invoke its internal law as a justification for not performing its treaty obligations ... that it grants a special right to federal States without giving an offsetting privilege to unitary States and that it could therefore lead to imbalances in rights and obligations between unitary and federal States if the latter encounter constitutional difficulties in carrying out their obligations under the General Agreement.

“The Panel considered that, as an exception to a general principle of law favouring certain contracting parties, Article XXIV:12 should be interpreted in a way that meets the constitutional difficulties which federal States may have in ensuring the observance of the provisions of the General Agreement by local governments, while minimizing the danger that such difficulties lead to imbalances in the rights and obligations of contracting parties. Only an interpretation according to which Article XXIV:12 does not limit the applicability of the provisions of the General Agreement but merely limits the obligations of federal States to secure their implementation would achieve this aim.”²⁰²

In Council discussion of this Panel Report in October 1985, the representative of South Africa stated that “The Panel’s findings and conclusions were addressed to the Federal Government” to which the Panel “had recommended certain actions” so that “the provincial governments were ... not directly involved in adoption of this report”.²⁰³

In the 1988 Panel Report on “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Alcoholic Drinks by Canadian Provincial Marketing Agencies”, the Panel “noted Canada’s claim that the practices [concerning listing/delisting requirements and the availability of points of sale which discriminate against imported alcoholic beverages] ... were not ‘restrictions’ in the sense of Article XI because ... they were provincial measures and because they were consistent with the Provincial Statement of Intentions. ... The Panel noted that the relevance of the fact that the measures concerned were provincial measures would be examined in the second part of its findings [concerning Article XXIV:12]”.²⁰⁴

The 1991 Report of the Working Party on the “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” notes that

“Some members noted that the specific obligations incurred by the two parties in terms of Article 103 of the FTA appeared to be more direct than the obligations of Article XXIV:12 to ensure compliance at the sub-federal levels of government in respect of international trade matters. The representative of a group of countries ... wondered whether there was a difference in the constitutional status of bilateral agreements compared to multilateral agreements which created an impediment to undertaking more stringent commitments at sub-federal level under multilateral agreements. ... The representative of Canada said that regarding this matter, the two parties agreed that there was no difference between the constitutional status of federal obligations of bilateral and multilateral agreements with respect to the compliance of sub-federal governments. ... The representative of the United States said that the wording of Article 103 did not alter the federal jurisdiction on international trade, regardless of how the wording was formulated in the two provisions”.²⁰⁵

In the 1992 Panel Report on “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies”

“The Panel ... noted that Article XXIV:12 was not an exception to other rules of the General Agreement; it merely qualified the obligation to implement the provisions of the General Agreement in relation to measures taken by regional and local governments and authorities. Consequently, the provisions of the General Agreement were applicable to measures by regional and local governments and authorities notwithstanding Article XXIV:12. This followed clearly from the obligation set out in this provision ‘to ensure observance of the provisions of this Agreement’ by such governments and authorities because a provision could only be ‘observed’ by a government or authority if it was applicable to it”.²⁰⁶

The 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Measures Affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages” examined the application of Article XXIV in relation to various measures of state and local governments within the United States.

“The Panel noted from the drafting history of Article XXIV:12²⁰⁷ that this provision was designed to apply only to those measures by regional or local governments or authorities which the central government cannot control because they fall outside its jurisdiction under the constitutional distribution of powers. The Panel agreed with this interpretation in view of the general principle of international treaty law that a party to a treaty may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty obligation.²⁰⁸ As indicated in an earlier panel report,²⁰⁹ not yet adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the qualification in Article XXIV:12 of the obligation to implement the provisions of the General Agreement grants a special right to federal states without giving an offsetting privilege to unitary states, and has to be construed narrowly so as to avoid undue imbalances in rights and obligations between contracting parties with unitary and federal constitutions. The above-mentioned interpretation -- according to which Article XXIV:12 applies only to measures by regional or local authorities which the central government cannot control under the constitutional distribution of powers -- meets the constitutional difficulties which central governments may have in ensuring the observance of the provisions of the General Agreement by regional and local authorities, but minimizes the risk that such difficulties lead to imbalances in the rights and obligations of contracting parties”.²¹⁰

The 1990 Panel Report on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile” notes that in this proceeding, Chile argued that, noting the Commission’s responsibility for EEC trade policy, and that member States’ import licensing systems were determined by EEC legislation, the Commission should be held responsible for ensuring that its member States administered such licensing in accordance with Article X; the

EEC stated that it understood Article XXIV:12 to be an exception and that since the Community had not invoked it in the present case, it saw no grounds for the Panel to examine the EEC's obligations thereunder. "The Panel ... noted that the EEC Commission Regulations in question were directly applicable in all of the ten Member States concerned in a substantially uniform manner, although there were some minor administrative variations ... The Panel found that these differences were minimal and did not in themselves establish a breach of Article X:3. The Panel therefore did not consider it necessary to examine the question whether the requirement of 'uniform' administration of trade regulations was applicable to the Community as a whole or to each of its Member States individually".²¹¹

Paragraphs 13-15 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provide as follows:

"Each Member is fully responsible under GATT 1994 for the observance of all provisions of GATT 1994, and shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure such observance by regional and local governments and authorities within its territory.

"The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of GATT 1994 as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding may be invoked in respect of measures affecting its observance taken by regional or local governments or authorities within the territory of a Member. When the Dispute Settlement Body has ruled that a provision of GATT 1994 has not been observed, the responsible Member shall take such reasonable measures as may be available to it to ensure its observance. The provisions relating to compensation and suspension of concessions or other obligations apply in cases where it has not been possible to secure such observance.

"Each Member undertakes to accord sympathetic consideration to and afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding any representations made by another Member concerning measures affecting the operation of GATT 1994 taken within the territory of the former".

(2) "reasonable measures"

As regards the meaning to be given to the term "reasonable", see the discussion under Article III concerning the interpretative note to Article III:1, which defines the term "reasonable measures" in the case of national legislation authorizing local governments to impose taxes.

The 1985 Panel Report on "Canada - Measures Affecting the Sale of Gold Coins", which has not been adopted, includes the following Panel findings:

"The Panel considered that neither the wording nor the drafting history of Article XXIV:12 supported the Canadian view that each contracting party had the right to determine itself whether a measure was 'reasonable' within the meaning of Article XXIV:12. The obligation to take reasonable measures which Article XXIV:12 imposes on federal States is a counterpart to the privilege which this provision confers upon these States (see para. 42 above). If the Canadian position were accepted, the obligation under Article XXIV:12 would be void of all substance while the corresponding privilege would remain intact.

"The Panel consequently examined what meaning should be given to the term 'reasonable'. The Panel noted that the only indication in the General Agreement of what was meant by 'reasonable' was contained in the interpretative note to Article III:1, which defined the term 'reasonable measures' for the case of national legislation authorizing local governments to impose taxes. According to this note the question of whether the repeal of such enabling legislation would be a reasonable measure required by Article XXIV:12 should be answered by taking into account the spirit of the inconsistent local tax laws, on the one hand, and the administrative or financial difficulties to which the repeal of the enabling legislation would give rise, on the other. The basic principle embodied in this note is, in the view of the Panel, that in determining which measures to secure the observance of the provisions of the General Agreement are 'reasonable' within the meaning of Article XXIV:12, the consequences of their non-observance by the local government for trade relations with other contracting parties are to be weighed against the domestic difficulties of securing observance. While recognizing that this note refers to the case of national enabling legislation, the Panel considered that the basic principle embodied therein was applicable to the present case".²¹²

The 1988 Panel Report on "Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Alcoholic Drinks by Canadian Provincial Marketing Agencies" provides:

"The Panel noted that Canada had taken the position that the only authority that could judge whether all reasonable measures had been taken under Article XXIV:12 was in this case the Canadian government. While noting that in the final analysis it was the contracting party concerned that would be the judge as to whether or not specific measures could be taken, the Panel concluded that Canada would have to demonstrate to the CONTRACTING PARTIES that it had taken all reasonable measures available and that it would then be for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to decide whether Canada had met its obligations under Article XXIV:12.

"The Panel noted that the Government of Canada considered that it had already taken such reasonable measures as were available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of the General Agreement by the provincial liquor boards. The Panel, however, also noted that the efforts of the Canadian federal authorities had been directed towards ensuring the observance of these provisions as they themselves interpreted them and not as interpreted in these findings. The Panel therefore concluded that the measures taken by the Government of Canada were clearly not all the reasonable measures as might be available to it to ensure observance of the provisions of the General Agreement by the provincial liquor boards, as provided in Article XXIV:12 and that therefore the Government of Canada had not yet complied with the provisions of that paragraph. The Panel was of the view, however, that in the circumstances the Government of Canada should be given a reasonable period of time to take such measures to bring the practices of the provincial liquor boards into line with the relevant provisions of the General Agreement".²¹³

The 1992 Panel on "Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies", the members of which were the same as the 1988 Panel above, examined the application of Article XXIV:12 to various measures, some of which they had examined in 1988. With respect to certain measures examined which had not been before the Panel before (restrictions on private delivery of beer, and the imposition of minimum prices by a number of provincial liquor boards), "the Panel found it appropriate to follow the procedure adopted by the 1988 Panel ... and to propose that the Government of Canada should be given a reasonable period of time to take measures which would lead to an elimination of this practice".²¹⁴ However, the Panel "considered that, pending the elimination of such discrimination, the liquor boards should in no case levy charges for the delivery of imported beer higher than the costs actually incurred by them".²¹⁵

With respect to certain measures which had already been examined in 1988 (restrictions on access to points of sale for beer, and differential mark-up practices of the provincial liquor boards):

"... the Panel proceeded to examine whether Canada had demonstrated that it had taken all reasonable measures available with respect to the different practices which the Panel had found to be contrary to the General Agreement. The Panel considered that, for this purpose, Canada would have to show that it had made a serious, persistent and convincing effort to secure compliance by the provincial liquor boards with the provisions of the General Agreement. The Panel first reviewed Canada's claim that it had taken reasonable measures to eliminate restrictions on access to points of sale for beer, which the Panel had found to be inconsistent with the General Agreement. It recalled that the 1988 Panel had already concluded that 'the availability of points of sale which discriminate against imported alcoholic beverages were restrictions made effective through state-trading operations contrary to Article XI:1'. As a result of that finding the CONTRACTING PARTIES had requested Canada to take 'such reasonable measures as may be available to ensure observance of the provisions of Article XI of the provincial liquor boards'. After reviewing all the information and documentation before it, including the statement made by Canada ... the Panel came to the conclusion that, in spite of that request made by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1988, Canada had not demonstrated that it had made serious, persistent and convincing efforts to secure elimination of restrictions on points of sale for beer. These discriminatory practices had not been dealt with in the agreement reached with the EEC subsequent to the adoption of the 1988 Panel report, nor had they been specifically addressed in the interprovincial agreement designed to achieve an integrated market for Canadian beer. The Panel therefore concluded that Canada had failed to comply with its obligations under Article XXIV:12 of the General Agreement with respect to availability of points of sale.”²¹⁶

“The Panel then turned to the differential mark-up practices of the provincial liquor boards and to its finding in paragraph 5.21 above, that these practices were inconsistent with Article II:4 of the General Agreement. It noted that, as a result of the agreement between the European Communities and Canada and of the interprovincial agreement, the liquor boards had accepted to eliminate discriminatory pricing practices on beer (both domestic and imported), not later than 31 December 1994. It recalled, in this context, the last sentence of the Note Ad Article III:1, which indicated that the term ‘reasonable measures’ could be interpreted to permit the elimination of inconsistent measures ‘gradually over a transition period, if abrupt action would create serious administrative and financial difficulties’. Since the CONTRACTING PARTIES had already requested Canada in 1988 to take reasonable measures to ensure that differential mark-ups were not applied contrary to the provisions of Article II:4, the Panel asked itself whether the provincial liquor boards encountered administrative and financial difficulties which could justify a transition period of more than six years to ensure the application of differential mark-ups in full compliance with the 1988 Panel report. This was clearly not the case: as far as administrative practices were concerned, the Panel had already noted that most provincial liquor boards had introduced a system of cost-of-service charges (in addition to a uniform mark-up); any financial difficulties could be resolved by increasing the mark-up uniformly for both imported and domestic beer. By agreeing, in 1991, to become party to an agreement which sanctioned postponement until the end of 1994 of a practice which the CONTRACTING PARTIES had found in 1988 to be inconsistent with the General Agreement, the Government of Canada could hardly claim that it had taken a reasonable measure in compliance with the CONTRACTING PARTIES’ request. The Panel therefore concluded that Canada had not made serious, persistent and convincing efforts to secure elimination of discriminatory mark-up practices and that it had not taken all the reasonable measures as might be available to it to ensure observance by the provincial liquor boards of the provisions of Article II:4 of the General Agreement. The Panel therefore found that with respect to provincial liquor board mark-up practices Canada had failed to comply with its obligations under Article XXIV:12.”²¹⁷

In the 1992 Panel Report on “United States - Measures affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages”,

“The Panel recalled that the United States invoked Article XXIV:12 in respect of any state measures that the Panel were to find to be inconsistent with the General Agreement. ... The Panel noted that the United States had not provided the Panel with any evidence in support of its invocation of this provision. In particular, it had presented no evidence in support of its claim that reasonable measures were not available to it to ensure the observance by the state authorities of the relevant provisions of the General Agreement. ...

“The Panel recalled its finding with respect to the [Protocol of Provisional Application] that, according to the evidence submitted to this Panel, GATT law is part of federal law in the United States and as such is superior to GATT-inconsistent state law.²¹⁸ Based on the evidence submitted, the Panel concluded that the United States has not demonstrated to the Panel that the general obligation of contracting parties to withdraw measures inconsistent with the General Agreement cannot be observed in this case by the United

In the 1988 Panel Report on “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Alcoholic Drinks by Canadian Provincial Marketing Agencies”, “The Panel noted that there was no dispute that the provincial liquor boards were “regional authorities” within the meaning of Article XXIV:12”.²²¹ In the 1992 Panel Report on “Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies”, “The Panel noted that the parties to the dispute agreed that the provincial liquor boards were ‘regional authorities’ within the meaning of Article XXIV:12 of the General Agreement and that this Article was therefore applicable to all the provincial practices at issue”.²²²

Divergent views have been expressed on various occasions as to whether the regional economic integration provisions of Article XXIV can justify a discriminatory application of balance-of-payments restrictions. At the Twelfth Session in 1957, four sub-groups were appointed to examine the relevant provisions of the Treaty of Rome in the light of the provisions of the General Agreement. The Report of Sub-Group B, which examined those provisions of the Treaty relating to quantitative restrictions²²⁴ notes the difference in views between certain members of the Sub-Group, who expressed concern that the Rome Treaty provisions would permit a Member State to use quantitative restrictions not justified by its own balance-of-payments position, and the six EEC member States, who considered that the opening phrase of paragraph 5 of Article XXIV provided a general exception under which they were entitled to deviate from the other provisions of the General Agreement, including Articles XI to XIV, insofar as the application of these provisions would constitute obstacles to the formation of the customs union and to the achievement of its objectives.²²⁵ See under Article XII:1.

See also the July 1994 Secretariat background document for consultations under Article XII:4(a) with the Slovak Republic concerning a surcharge imposed for balance-of-payments reasons; this document notes that the import surcharge applied to all imports in a non-discriminatory manner, including “the Czech Republic as well as other countries with which the Slovak Republic has made bilateral or multilateral free trade agreements.”²²⁹ The 1994 basic document supplied by Poland for consultations under Article XII:4 notes that a surcharge imposed for balance-of-payments purposes will be applied to all imports; see directly below under relationship with Article XIII.²³⁰

3. Article XIII

The 1984 Report of the “Panel on Newsprint” examined the claim of Canada concerning the application of a tariff concession on newsprint established by the European Communities. The concession in the EC’s Schedule LXXII provided for an annual tariff quota of 1.5 million tonnes duty-free, leaving the bound duty rate at 7 per cent for imports exceeding that quota. Under agreements between the EC and the EFTA countries, newsprint imports from EFTA countries became duty-free as from 1 January 1984, and the EC then opened a duty-free tariff quota for m.f.n. suppliers of 500,000 tonnes for newsprint for the year 1984. The Panel “concluded that the EC, in unilaterally establishing for 1984 a duty-free quota of 500,000 tonnes, had not acted in conformity with their obligations under Article II of the GATT. ...

“The Panel carefully noted and examined the statement by the EC that, should the Panel consider the action taken by the EC as not being in conformity with the GATT, they might proceed to option (b) under which the tariff quota would be maintained at 1.5 million tonnes but that imports from all sources, including the EFTA countries, would be recorded against that quota; once the latter had been filled, the Community’s formal contractual obligations would have been met. While the Panel could find no specific GATT provision forbidding such action and no precedents to guide it, it considered that this would not be an appropriate solution to the problem and would create an unfortunate precedent. It is in the nature of a duty-free tariff quota to allow specified quantities of imports into a country duty-free which would otherwise be dutiable, which is not the case for EFTA imports by virtue of the free-trade agreements. Imports which are already duty-free, due to a preferential agreement, cannot by their very nature participate in an m.f.n. duty-free quota. The situation in this respect could only change if the free-trade agreements with the EFTA countries were to be discontinued; in this case these countries would be entitled to fall back on their GATT rights vis-à-vis the EC, which rights continue to exist.

“On the basis of the findings and conclusions reached above, the Panel suggests that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend that the European Communities engage promptly in renegotiations under the procedures of Article XXVIII of the GATT with regard to the tariff quota on newsprint in Schedule LXXII. Further, the Panel suggests that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend to the European Communities that, pending the termination of such renegotiations, the duty-free tariff quota of 1.5 million tonnes for m.f.n. suppliers be maintained”.²³¹

The 1986 Report of the Working Party on the Sixth Review under the Protocol of Accession of Hungary notes the view of Hungary that “it was unacceptable that Spain’s accession to the EEC resulted in the introduction of discriminatory quantitative restrictions vis-à-vis Hungary. Article XXIV did not release any contracting party from the obligation of non-discrimination as provided for by Article XIII of the GATT”.²³² In Council discussion on this Report it was pointed out that “The Working Party had noted that discriminatory quantitative restrictions not consistent with Article XIII were still maintained against Hungarian exports by the European Economic Community, and had discussed at length the slow pace at which the remaining restrictions were being removed”.²³³ The Report of the Working Party on “Trade with Romania - Sixth Review under the Protocol of Accession” also records the view of the representative of Hungary with regard to quantitative restrictions resulting from the accession of Spain and Portugal to the EEC “that Article XXIV of the GATT did not allow any contracting party the introduction of restrictions inconsistent with Article XIII”.²³⁴

The 1988 Report of the Working Party on “Accession of Portugal and Spain to the European Communities” records the concern of several members of the Working Party that “since acceding to the Communities, Spain had introduced discriminatory quantitative restrictions which contravened Articles XI, XIII and XXIV:4 as well as their countries’ Protocols of Accession to the GATT under which contracting parties undertook not to increase the element of discrimination which they maintained on these countries’ imports. ... Since Article XXIV did not provide a waiver from obligations contained in Articles XI and XIII and did not allow or require a country acceding to a customs union to adopt the more restrictive trade régime of the customs union, they called on the Communities and Spain to eliminate all GATT-inconsistent measures, which in the case of one of these countries affected one quarter of its total exports to Spain”.²³⁵

The 1994 basic document supplied by Poland for consultations under Article XII:4 notes with respect to a surcharge imposed for balance-of-payments purposes that “As required by Article XIII:1 of the General Agreement, the surcharge will be applied to all imports without preference of discrimination as regards the type of goods, sources of imports and the nature of bilateral relations with the countries of origin, rates, procedures and all other modalities of the measure. It will apply equally to all trade, including trading partners with whom Poland’s commercial relations are based on Article XXIV of the General Agreement.”²³⁶

The modalities of application of Article XIX have been discussed on a number of occasions in relation to agreements presented under Article XXIV. Differing views have been expressed on whether the fact that Article XIX is not mentioned among the exceptions in Article XXIV:8 should be interpreted to mean that a member of a customs union or free-trade area is entitled to exempt from the application of Article XIX measures imports from other members of the customs union or free-trade area.²³⁷

The Reports of the Working Parties concerning the agreements between the European Communities and Austria²³⁸, Iceland²³⁹, Portugal²⁴⁰, Sweden²⁴¹ and Switzerland and Liechtenstein²⁴² each contain the following three paragraphs:

“Some members of the Working Party expressed their concern that the parties to the Agreement seemed to interpret the provisions of Article XXIV:8(b) of the General Agreement so as to allow discriminatory application of Article XIX when safeguard action was being taken. They would like it to be understood in the Working Party that the reply given by the parties to the Agreement to the question on application of safeguard provisions did in fact mean that safeguard action would be taken on a strictly most-favoured-nation basis.

“The representative of the European Communities called attention to the omission of Article XIX from among those mentioned in Article XXIV:8(b), which required the elimination of certain ‘other restrictive regulations of commerce' as between members of the free-trade area. His authorities, accordingly, were of the view that they were free to exempt these members from possible restrictions imposed under Article XIX.

"Some members could not accept that explanation. In their view, the invocation of Article XXIV did not mean that other Articles of the General Agreement should cease to apply; and these members could not agree that the invocation of Article XXIV permitted the discriminatory application of Article XIX".²⁴³

With regard to the EEC's Article XIX action in 1973 relating to imports of magnetophones into Italy, Japan noted "that the import restrictive measure did not apply to the associated countries and the other members of the Community, while Article XIX required global application". The representative of the EC stated that the measure was consistent with Article XXIV²⁴⁴. The matter was subsequently discussed in the twenty-ninth session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The representative of the European Communities stated that while Article XIX measures "should apply erga omnes, they need not apply to countries which had an agreement with the Community in accordance with Article XXIV. The Community was always prepared to enter into consultations and consultations had been held on this subject".²⁴⁵

The Panel Report on "Norway's Article XIX Action on Certain Textile Products" noted the exclusion of EFTA and EEC products from the scope of Norway's Article XIX action, but the Panel, noting that Hong Kong had limited its formal request for a ruling on Norway's Article XIX action, also "noted and consequently based its decision on the statements by Hong Kong that ... a finding concerning the exclusion from the quotas of the EEC and EFTA countries was not necessary"²⁴⁶ and did not make a finding with respect to the exclusion of these products.

In "Questions and Replies" concerning the Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States one question related to the provisions in this agreement providing that each party to this agreement could exempt imports from the other party from Article XIX actions taken by it, except where imports from the other contribute importantly to serious injury caused by all imports. The two parties stated in response that "there is no agreed interpretation by contracting parties of the relationship between Articles XIX and XXIV. There is, however, a practice in place under other Article XXIV arrangements that provides for the exemption of Parties to the arrangement from safeguard actions".²⁴⁷ In the Report of the Working Party on this agreement, various members of the Working Party took issue with this statement or with its implications for the determination of serious injury under Article XIX:

"... For these members, selective non-application of safeguard measures to the other party was not consistent with the provisions of Article XIX of the General Agreement. ... One member considered that discriminatory provisions of the Agreement on global emergency actions diluted the principle of non-discrimination and m.f.n. application of emergency measures, particularly when imports from the other party contributed to the serious injury".²⁴⁸

With respect to the September 1991 Article XIX action by Austria consisting of a global quota applied to all imports of certain types of cement and cement preparations, except for imports from the EC and EFTA member states, Japan and a number of other contracting parties stated at the October 1991 Council meeting that in their view, Article XIX did not permit a contracting party to exempt its partners in free-trade agreements from the application of its safeguard measures. Austria stated that it had exempted these imports on the basis of the Stockholm Convention and the association agreement between Austria and the EC; that these were agreements notified under Article XXIV; and that since Article XIX was not mentioned in the list in Article XXIV:8(b), measures taken thereunder might be not applied to other members of a free-trade area.²⁴⁹

Other instances of non-application of Article XIX measures to imports from other members of a regional trade agreement include the following: import licensing imposed by the Federal Republic of Germany on coal products since September 1958 only for imports from non-ECSC countries²⁵⁰; quantitative restrictions imposed by Australia in 1976 on chest freezers for all imports other than those under the existing special trading arrangements provided for in the New Zealand-Australia Free Trade Agreement²⁵¹; action under Article XIX by Hungary in November 1992 with respect to certain paper and paper products, but not applied to imports from the EEC or from Finland; two Article XIX actions in 1993 by Austria, on certain types of cement and certain preparations containing cement, and certain fertilizers, from which imports originating in EC or EFTA member States were exempted²⁵²; and a tariff quota under Article XIX imposed by Canada in 1993 on boneless beef, from which imports originating in the US were exempted.²⁵³ On the other hand, there are also instances of application of Article XIX safeguard measures on a non-discriminatory basis to all imports, including imports from other members of a regional trade agreement under Article XXIV.²⁵⁴

The possibility of invoking Article XXII with regard to agreements presented under Article XXIV has been expressed in various working party reports since the examination of the Treaty of Rome.²⁵⁵ During the consideration at the Twelfth Session of the Treaty of Rome in a special Committee on the Rome Treaty consisting of all contracting parties, when it was suggested to continue examination of this Treaty by prolonging the Committee's mandate, the representative of the Interim Committee for the Common Market and Euratom stated that "the Six ... could not accept any special procedures which would imply for them additional obligations not applied to the other contracting parties. In regard to the question under consideration, the provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of the General Agreement should be sufficient for the holding of any consultations which the CONTRACTING PARTIES might desire".²⁵⁶ Also in connection with the examination of the Treaty of Rome, the "Procedures under Article XXII on Questions Affecting the Interests of a Number of Contracting Parties" were agreed in 1958 in the Intersessional Committee and adopted at the Thirteenth Session.²⁵⁷ The 1978 Working Party Report on "Agreement between the EEC and Egypt" notes that the representative of the EEC stated that "As regards the possibility of consultations with the contracting parties concerning the incidence of the Agreement on their trade interests... nothing prevented these countries from invoking the relevant provisions of the General Agreement, such as Articles XXII and XXIII ... The representative of Egypt said that his Government was also prepared to enter into consultations under Articles XXII and XXIII should the need arise".²⁵⁸ See also discussion in the Council concerning the invocation of Article XXIII in relation to measures under Article XXIV.²⁵⁹

In 1974, a Canadian request for a panel because of lack of agreement in Article XXIV:6 negotiations led to the establishment of a panel under paragraphs 1(c) and 2 of Article XXIII, which was not activated because the parties reached an agreement; see this and other instances of conciliation and arbitration at page 811 above.

The 1985 Panel Report on "EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region," which has not been adopted, contains, inter alia, the following findings as to the relationship between Articles XXIII and XXIV.

PARTIES and without prejudice to any decision CONTRACTING PARTIES might take in the future on such a matter, the Panel was of the view that it would not be appropriate to determine the conformity of an agreement with the requirements of Article XXIV on the basis of a complaint by a contracting party under Article XXIII:1(a). The Panel did not preclude that amongst the procedures available to CONTRACTING PARTIES, a panel could be established to give an advisory opinion on the conformity of an agreement or an interpretation of specific criteria under Article XXIV to assist CONTRACTING PARTIES in making findings or recommendations under Article XXIV:7(b). However, the Panel was of the view that irrespective of the procedure to be followed for this purpose, including a panel, this should be done clearly in the context of Article XXIV and not Article XXIII, as an assessment of all the duties, regulations of commerce and trade coverage as well as the interests and rights of all contracting parties were at stake in such an examination, and not just the interests and rights of one contracting party raising a complaint.

“The Panel considered that the practice, so far followed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, never to use the procedures of Article XXIII:2 to make recommendations or rulings on the GATT-conformity of measures subject to special review procedures was sound. It felt that the purposes these procedures served and the balance of interests underlying them would be lost if contracting parties could invoke the general procedures of Article XXIII:2 for the purpose of requesting decisions by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, on measures to be reviewed under the special procedures. The panel therefore concluded that it should, in the absence of a specific mandate by the Council to the contrary, follow this practice also in the case before it and therefore abstain from an overall examination of the bilateral agreements.”²⁶⁰

“The Panel further noted that in some of the conclusions on agreements, following their examination under Article XXIV:7, the CONTRACTING PARTIES had recalled that procedures for consultations under Article XXII had been accepted and had then noted that ‘the other normal procedures of the General Agreement would also be available to contracting parties to call into question any measures taken’ under the interim agreements (see Rome Treaty: BISD 7S/71; EFTA: BISD 9S/20; LAFTA: BISD 9S/21, and Finnish Association with EFTA: BISD 10S/24). The reference to ‘the other normal procedures of the General Agreement’, after the mention of Article XXII, can only be understood to mean the procedures of Article XXIII. The CONTRACTING PARTIES have established in the above conclusions that this procedure could be used to call into question ‘any measure’ taken by the parties to the agreements; they did not mention the possibility of calling into question the agreements as a whole, under the procedures of Article XXIII. Furthermore, the Panel noted that in the reports of the working parties relating to the respective EEC agreements with Egypt, Lebanon, and Jordan, it was specified that ‘as regards the possibility of consultations with the contracting parties concerning the incidence of the Agreement on their trade interests, which had been mentioned by some members of the Working Party, the spokesman for the European Communities stated that nothing prevented these countries from invoking the relevant provisions of the General Agreement, such as Articles XXII and XXIII’ (BISD 25S/119 para.15, 139 para.16, and 147 para.16).

“... a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the agreements would inevitably have amounted to a judgment on their conformity with Article XXIV. Had it been recognized that an agreement was in conformity with the requirements of Article XXIV, the implementation of this agreement could no longer be considered as nullifying or impairing benefits accruing under the General Agreement. On the other hand, had the agreement been considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as not being in conformity with the said requirements, its implementation would amount to a clear infringement of the provisions of the General Agreement which would constitute prima facie a clear case of nullification or impairment in the sense of Article XXIII:1(a).”²⁶¹

The Panel’s conclusion “that in this particular situation the balance of rights and obligations underlying Articles I and XXIV of the General Agreement had been upset to the disadvantage of the contracting parties not parties to these agreements and that the United States was therefore entitled to offsetting or compensatory adjustment to the extent that the grant of the preferences had caused substantial adverse effects to its actual trade or its trade opportunities”²⁶² was disputed by several contracting parties in the GATT Council discussion of the Panel report, which was not adopted.²⁶³

The 1991 Report of the Working Party on the “Free-Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States” records that its members were concerned about possible conflict between the bilateral dispute settlement procedure under the FTA and the multilateral dispute settlement procedure under the GATT. They feared this situation would result in either delays in the adoption of panel reports by CONTRACTING PARTIES or the report never being adopted due to contradictory findings in the FTA bilateral dispute settlement process and the General Agreement multilateral process. In the view of one member “such obstruction of the proper functioning of the multilateral dispute settlement process was not in accordance with the obligations of parties under the GATT”.²⁶⁴ The representative of the United States “emphasized that the rights and obligations of the FTA parties under the GATT remained unchanged”.²⁶⁵

Paragraph 12 of the Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the GATT 1994 provides that “The provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII of GATT 1994 as elaborated and applied by the Dispute Settlement Understanding may be invoked with respect to any matters arising from the application of those provisions of Article XXIV relating to customs unions, free-trade areas or interim agreements leading to the formation of a customs union or free-trade area”.

6. Article XXVIII

The 1966 Report of the Working Party on “Turkey - Consultation under Article XXII:2” describes the results of consultations in respect of the following matter raised by the United Kingdom: “The application by Turkey of Article XXIV:5(a) and of Article XXIV:6 when, in the course of forming a customs union with the European Economic Community, the Turkish Government reduces its tariff in successive stages towards the Community on the one hand and towards other contracting parties on the other”.²⁶⁶ Under a waiver, the Turkish Government was imposing duties on a number of imports in excess of bound rates, and was seeking to renegotiate these duties under Article XXVIII; meanwhile Turkey had notified its association agreement with the EEC as an interim agreement leading to a customs union. The United Kingdom sought to ascertain the Turkish Government’s intentions with respect to aligning its tariff to the EEC’s and reducing its tariff on imports from Community sources to zero. Some members of the Working Party pointed out that

“while there may have been no connexion in intent between the Ankara Agreement and the tariff increase, in terms of practical effect the connexion existed and the way in which Turkey moved toward customs union with the Community was of great interest to third countries, particularly in respect of duty rates on items presently bound in Schedule XXXVII ...”.²⁶⁷

The Turkish Government offered to incorporate a Declaration into agreements reached in the renegotiations under Article XXVIII, providing that “it will give due consideration to the equitable rights of contracting parties who are not members of the Ankara Agreement when it comes to implementing differential tariff treatment in favour of the EEC on these items”.²⁶⁸

7. Article XXX

During the Review Session of 1954-55, in response to a question whether an amendment to Article XXIV would require unanimous acceptance for its entry into force if it involved a departure from the no-new-preference rule in Article I, the Executive Secretary gave the following legal opinion:

“By virtue of the provisions of Article XXX an amendment to Article XXIV would enter into force for those contracting parties accepting it upon acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties. This would apply, however, only in the case of an amendment which was in accordance with the principles of Article XXIV, that is to say if it relates to an arrangement for establishing a customs union or a free-trade area involving the complete or substantial abolition of duties or restrictions between the parties to the arrangement. If an amendment did not look to this objective it would amount to an amendment of Article I and would therefore require unanimity”.²⁷⁰

8. Article XXXIII

The 1989 Report of the Working Party on the “Accession of Bolivia” notes:

“Some members referred to the effect of Bolivia’s participation in regional agreements on its ability to enter into tariff negotiations with interested contracting parties. These members noted that the provisions of Article XXIV of the General Agreement and of the Enabling Clause did not support the assertion that trade concessions exchanged in the context of integration agreements could not be affected by tariff concessions negotiated with third countries. ... Any attempt to exclude concessional products from the tariff negotiations would be a reason for serious concern. In the view of these members, in the case of countries with wide-ranging preferential tariff commitments, the insistence on maintaining such a line of action might be tantamount to a refusal to enter into tariff negotiations with third countries which, without questioning Bolivia’s sovereign right to make or not to make concessions, they would not be able to accept. A member requested that Bolivia provide a list of the items in Bolivia’s tariff schedule which would be subject to the Common Minimum External Tariff of the Cartagena Agreement. This member added that in the view of her Government, Bolivia should be prepared to participate fully in tariff negotiations in connection with its accession proceedings without regard to instruments that were not in force at the present time”.²⁷¹

9. Part IV and the Enabling Clause

Reports of Working Parties on agreements presented under Article XXIV record divergent views as to the relationship between Article XXIV and Part IV of the General Agreement. On the one side, the parties to these agreements have often taken the view that the conformity of the agreement with GATT should be examined also in the light of Part IV. For instance, some Working Party Reports on EEC agreements with Mediterranean countries record the view of the parties to these agreements that, while Article XXIV remained fully valid as far as the EEC was concerned, the lack of reciprocal commitments on the part of the less-developed contracting parties “was consistent with the spirit and letter of Part IV of the General Agreement”.²⁷² On the other side, the view has also been expressed that provisions in agreements for the according of “reverse preferences” by developing countries to developed countries were inconsistent with the principle of non-reciprocity in Part IV.²⁷³ In the Working Party on “EEC - Association with African and Malagasy States” the view was expressed that the Agreement should be examined in the light of Part IV and that Part IV did not permit trade discrimination among developing countries²⁷⁴; the parties to the Yaoundé Convention replied that Article XXIV:5 specifies that the provisions in the General Agreement shall not prevent the formation of free-trade areas, and as Part IV does not

In the 1985 Panel report on “EC - Tariff Treatment on Imports of Citrus Products from Certain Countries in the Mediterranean Region”, which has not been adopted, the Panel found as follows:

“The Panel considered that Article XXIV and Part IV constituted distinct sets of rights and obligations and that measures taken under one could not be covered by the other. As these agreements had been presented under the specific provisions of Article XXIV, then, whatever the general impact of Part IV and the Enabling Clause on the GATT as a whole, the agreements would in any event need to conform to the precise criteria of Article XXIV. The Panel therefore did not consider Part IV and the Enabling Clause as being relevant and therefore did not consider it any further.”²⁷⁷

The 1979 Decision on Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries (“Enabling Clause”) provides, inter alia:

“1. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article I of the General Agreement, contracting parties may accord differential and more favourable treatment to developing countries¹, without according such treatment to other contracting parties.

“2. The provisions of paragraph 1 apply to the following:² ...

“(c) Regional or global arrangements entered into amongst less-developed contracting parties for the mutual reduction or elimination of tariffs and, in accordance with criteria or conditions which may be prescribed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, for the mutual reduction or elimination of non-tariff measures, on products imported from one another.”²⁷⁸

A list of the regional agreements notified under the Enabling Clause appears under Article I.

During 1992, there were extensive discussions in the Council and the Committee on whether the MERCOSUR Agreement should be notified and examined under the Enabling Clause or under Article XXIV. This agreement was notified under the Enabling Clause and the Committee established a working party with the following terms of reference:

“To examine the Southern Common Market Agreement (MERCOSUR) in the light of the relevant provisions of the Enabling Clause and of the General Agreement, including Article XXIV and to transmit a report and recommendations to the Committee for submission to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, with a copy of the report transmitted as well to the Council. III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

Corresponding provisions in the Havana Charter: Havana Charter Articles 42; 43; 44; 99:1(d) and Annex M; and 104:3 correspond to GATT Article XXIV paragraphs 1 and 2; 3; 4-10; 11; and 12 respectively. The corresponding provisions in the United States Draft Charter appear in Article 33; in the London and New York Drafts, in Article 38; and in the Geneva Draft, in Article 42.

Drafting history: Article 38 of the London Draft Charter contained provisions dealing with the territorial application of Chapter V of the Charter (“General Commercial Policy”), customs unions and frontier traffic.²⁸⁰ Regarding the question of the territorial application of the general commercial policy rules of the proposed Charter, Article 38:1 of the London Draft provided that Chapter V of the Charter would apply to the customs territories of members of the ITO and that where there were two or more customs territories under the jurisdiction of any member, each such customs territory would be considered as a separate member for the purpose of interpreting the provisions of Chapter V. The second paragraph of Article 38 provided that the commercial policy rules of Chapter V should not be construed to prevent advantages accorded by any member to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic, or “the formation of a union for customs purposes” of any customs territory of any member and any other customs territory on the condition that the duties and other regulations of commerce imposed by any such union in respect of trade with other members should “not on the whole be higher or more stringent than the average level of the duties and regulations of commerce applicable in the constituent territories prior to the formation of such union”. The term “a union of customs territories for customs purposes” was defined in Article 38 as “the substitution of a single customs territory for two or more customs territories, so that all tariffs and other restrictive regulations of commerce as between the territories of members of the union are substantially eliminated and substantially the same tariffs and other regulations of commerce are applied by each of the members of the union to the trade of territories not included in the union”. Regarding the procedural requirements for the formation of a customs union, the London Draft required any member proposing to enter into a customs union to consult with the ITO and to make available to the ITO such information regarding the proposed union as would enable it to make such reports and recommendations to members as it might deem appropriate. Finally, Article 38 contained a paragraph not included in the original proposal of the United States which recognized that in exceptional circumstances there might be justification for new preferential arrangements requiring an exception to the provisions of Chapter V. Such exceptions would be subject to approval by a two-thirds majority of the members of the ITO.

The Drafting Committee of the Preparatory Committee in January and February 1947 in New York made no substantial changes to the text of Article 38 of the Draft Charter.²⁸¹

During discussions during the Geneva meetings of the Preparatory Committee, it was decided to delete the paragraph in Article XXIV (and the corresponding Charter article) corresponding to the present Article XXIV:10. The General Agreement as agreed 30 October 1947 was the same as the Geneva Draft Charter Article 42, with the addition of provisions corresponding to paragraphs 11 and 12 of the present Article XXIV; the customs union provisions of both the Geneva Draft Charter Article and Article XXIV in the original text of the General Agreement were limited to customs unions and interim agreements necessary for the attainment of a customs union.

Article 42 was extensively revised at the Havana Conference. The three subjects which had previously been covered by one Article (territorial application, customs unions and frontier traffic) were divided into three separate Articles. Article 42 (territorial application) was an amended version of the first paragraph of the previous Article 42, while Article 43 (frontier traffic) constituted a modified version of the provisions previously contained in Article 42:2(b) of the Geneva Draft Charter.

Customs unions were dealt with in Article 44 of the Havana Charter, which differed substantially from the corresponding provisions in previous Charter drafts. A Secretariat Note of 1957 concerning the drafting history of paragraphs 4-10 of Article XXIV provides the following account.

²⁸¹New York Report p. 32, 77-78.

“Paragraph 1 (paragraph 4 in present GATT text) was new. The first sentence resulted from a decision that a redraft of paragraph 5 of Article 1 (Purpose and Objectives) could best be done by inserting this wording here. The second sentence was inserted by the working party.

“Paragraph 2 (paragraph 5 in present GATT text) was based on paragraph 2(b) of the Geneva Draft. Important additions, however, were the new provisions relating to the establishment of free-trade areas. This resulted from a proposal for an additional sub-paragraph to the effect that the provisions of this chapter shall not be construed to prevent:

‘the formation of a free-trade area by the conclusion of a free-trade agreement involving the substantial elimination of tariffs and other restrictive regulations of commerce between Members belonging to the same economic region’.

“The words ‘at the institution of’ at the end of the third line of sub-paragraph 5(a) of the present text were inserted at the request of the United Kingdom. Presumably the same principle motivated the drafting of the words ‘at the formation of’ with respect to free-trade areas in sub-paragraph 5(b).

“In the preamble to the paragraph the words ‘as between the territories of Members’ were inserted ... In sub-paragraph (a) it was recommended that the words ‘average level of the duties’ be replaced by ‘general incidence of the duties’ ...

“Paragraph 3 (paragraph 7 in present GATT text) was based on paragraph 3 of the Geneva Draft. Sub-paragraph (a) incorporated the substance of a proposal by the Italian delegation that any Member proposing to enter into a customs union ‘shall inform the Organization and give any ...’ and it was felt that the revised texts of sub-paragraphs went some way to meet the views of Argentina, Chile and Italy who had proposed the deletion of these sub-paragraphs in the Geneva text which had been more mandatory (e.g. ‘no Member shall institute or maintain an interim agreement ... if’ etc.).

“Paragraph 4 (paragraph 8 in present GATT text). The definition of a customs union, contained in the second sentence of paragraph 4 of the Geneva Draft, was amended and a definition of a free-trade area was added.

“The definition of a customs union in the Geneva Draft read as follows:

‘A customs union shall be understood to mean the substitution of a single customs territory for two or more customs territories, so that all tariffs and other restrictive regulations of commerce as between the territories of Members of the union are substantially eliminated and substantially the same tariffs and other regulations of commerce are applied by each of the Members of the union to trade of territories not included in the union.’

Paragraph 5 (paragraph 9 in GATT text). This was a new paragraph which was intended to cover problems which would arise in cases where there were preferential rates of duty in force between a country entering a customs union or a free-trade area and a country remaining outside ...

Paragraph 6 (paragraph 10 in GATT text). A new paragraph to cover proposals which do not fully comply with the requirements of the Article provided they lead to the establishment of a customs union or a free-trade area in the sense of the Article. It was the understanding of the Committee that this new paragraph would enable the Organization to approve the establishment of customs unions and free-trade areas which include non-members.”²⁸²

During the First Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which was held at the Havana Conference, the representative of France proposed the immediate replacement of the provisions of Article XXIV by the corresponding provisions of the Charter, stating that this “was a matter of fundamental importance to his Government in view of its plans for a customs union with Italy”.²⁸³ A Sub-Committee on Supersession was established and drew up the Special Protocol Relating to Article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which entered into effect on 7 June 1948.²⁸⁴ See also above at page 810 concerning the addition of Article XXIV:6 during this process.

The Havana Charter Article on “Preferential Agreements for Economic Development and Reconstruction” (Article 15), which expressly recognized the desirability of such preferential agreements and permitted them as an exception to the general most-favoured-nation obligation after approval by a two-thirds majority, was not incorporated into the General Agreement. Article 15 of the Charter was however referred to in connection with preferences between countries formerly a part of the Ottoman Empire, under Article I:3 of the General Agreement; see the chapter in this work on Article I.

During the Review Session in 1954-55 a number of changes to Article XXIV were considered and rejected.²⁸⁵ Two minor drafting changes were agreed and entered into force in October 1957: “constituent territories” was substituted for “parties” in the second sentence of paragraph 4; and “included” replaced “provided for” after the word “schedule” in the first sentence of paragraph 7(b).²⁸⁶

B. PREFERENTIAL TRADE AGREEMENTS NOTIFIED UNDER ARTICLE XXIV, 1948 TO 1994

This table is a compilation of preferential trade agreements notified to GATT since its inception, listed in chronological order according to the date of signature. For each entry, seven columns of information are provided: (i) name of the agreement; (ii) participating countries or contracting parties; (iii) the form in which the contracting parties presented their agreement (for example, free trade area, customs union or preferential trade arrangement); (iv) the document reference for the text of the agreement; (v) the date of signature; (vi) the date of entry into force; and (vii) the GATT action taken and corresponding document references.

In accordance with the Decision of the Council of 25 October 1972 (19S/13), contracting parties that sign an agreement falling within the terms of Article XXIV are to inscribe the item on the agenda of the first meeting of the Council following its signature. Members of the agreement provide copies of the text of the agreement to contracting parties in order to permit them to review the agreement. The third column of the table notes the manner in which the agreement was presented by its members in the GATT (for example, free-trade area, customs union). This information reflects GATT provisions and may consequently not convey other aspects of the agreement (for example, liberalization of services, commitments regarding labour standards or competition policies). The final column reports the last GATT action taken. A working party is generally established which submits a report and recommendations, if any, to the Council. A biennial reporting requirement was established for regional agreements under the Decision of 26 November 1971 (L/3641). Contracting parties claiming to have completed the implementation of free trade areas or customs unions (the EC, ANZCERTA, EFTA, and EC-EFTA agreements) have not submitted reports. The calendar for such reports has not been revived since 1987.

NOTES

1. Agreement terminated on 1 July 1955 and immediately superseded by a preferential trade agreement notified to GATT (Working Party Report adopted on 3 December 1955 (L/468, 10S/72)), and the subject of a waiver from Article I:1 under the Decision of 3 December 1955 (10S/17).
2. In 1952, the members of the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) obtained a waiver from Article I:1 under the Decision of 10 November 1952 (1S/17) which expired in 1958. Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom acceded to the EC on 1 January 1973, Greece acceded on 1 January 1981, Portugal and Spain acceded on 1 January 1986.
3. Nicaragua was the only member of the Multilateral Central American Free Trade and Economic Integration Treaty which was a GATT contracting party at the time of its formation. See entry for the participation of Nicaragua in the General Treaty for Central American Integration.
4. Cameroon joined the customs union on 23 June 1961. The common external tariff was implemented on 1 July 1962.

5. Denmark and the United Kingdom withdrew from EFTA on 1 January 1973 upon accession to the EC, and Portugal withdrew on 1 January 1986 upon accession to the EC. Iceland acceded to EFTA on 1 March 1970, Finland acceded on 1 January 1986, and Liechtenstein acceded on 1 September 1991.
6. The GATT Protocol of Accession of Switzerland provides that the customs territory of Switzerland is deemed to include the territory of the Principality of Liechtenstein as long as the customs union treaty with Switzerland is in force.
7. The 1961 Treaty reduced the period for the establishment of a free-trade area among members of the Central American Free Trade Area from 10 to five years and provided for the equalization of import duties within five years.
8. The 1980 Montevideo Treaty establishing the LAIA superseded the 1960 Montevideo Treaty establishing the LAFTA.
9. At the time of the formation of the free trade area, Borneo and Sarawak were dependent territories of the United Kingdom. On 30 October 1963, the government of Malaysia assumed the responsibility for the conduct of the external affairs of the former states of the Federation of Malay, including the states of Borneo and Sarawak (L/2077).
10. The date of signature is not available to the GATT Secretariat.
11. The Association agreement was extended in 1973 to cover the accession of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom to the EC. Greece acceded to the EC on 1 January 1981.
12. On 1 January 1986, Finland acceded to EFTA.
13. The Association agreement was supplemented by an Additional Protocol (with effect from 1 January 1973) establishing conditions, arrangements and a timetable for a transitional stage to the customs union. The Association agreement was extended in 1973 to ECSC products and to new members of the EEC (with effect from 1 March 1986).
14. Superseded by the 1971 Yaoundé II, which was superseded by the 1976 First Lomé Convention and its Second, Third and Fourth successor agreements.

22. Superseded by the 1976 First Lomé Convention and its Second, Third and Fourth successor agreements.
23. An Association Agreement between Mauritius and the Yaoundé Convention was signed on 12 May 1972 and entered into force on 1 June 1973.
24. Superseded by the 1976 Co-operation Agreement.
25. Supplemented the 1964 Association Agreement. The Association agreement was extended in 1973 to ECSC products and to new members of the EEC (with effect from 1 March 1986).
26. Superseded the 1964 EEC-PTOM I.
27. Superseded by the 1975 Agreement on the implementation of free-trade area treatment and extended to cover ECSC products.
28. Spain acceded to the EC on 1 January 1986.
29. Superseded by the 1977 Agreement.
30. Other agreements covering trade matters between the EEC and Lebanon include the 1965 Agreement on Trade and Technical Cooperation, and the 1973 Protocol relating to the Agreement. The Agreements notified to the GATT in 1973 include one Agreement between the original six members of the EEC and Lebanon signed in 1972, and a Protocol extending the Agreement to Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom, signed in 1973.
31. Denmark and the United Kingdom withdrew from EFTA upon their accession. Ireland and the United Kingdom had concluded a free-trade agreement in 1966. The notification also concerned the proposed accession of EFTA member Norway, which did not subsequently ratify the treaty with the EC.
32. Portugal acceded to the EC on 1 January 1986.
33. Superseded the 1968 CARIFTA.
34. Bahamas, Belize, Dominica, Grenada, Montserrat, St. Lucia and St. Vincent acceded to the Treaty establishing the CARICOM in May 1974; Antigua and Barbuda and St. Kitts and Nevis acceded in July 1974.
35. See also the 1993 EFTA-Hungary Free Trade Agreement. The 1975 Agreement shall remain in force until the substance of its mutual benefits has been fully overtaken by the later Agreement.

36. See also the 1991 EFTA-Czech and Slovak Federal Republic Free Trade Agreement. The 1975 Agreement shall remain in force until the substance of its mutual benefits has been fully overtaken by the later Agreement. Following the dissolution of the former Czech and Slovak Federal Republic as of 1 January 1993, agreements were signed by the two successor states with EFTA that provide for the continuing application of the 1991 Agreement (L/7220).
37. The Agreement is no longer in force following the unification of Germany in 1989.
38. The Working Party had planned to reconvene in 18 months' time after the adoption of the Interim Report to continue its examination of the Agreement.
39. Superseded the 1973 Agreement.
40. Supplemented the 1962 Agreement. Greece acceded to the EC on 1 January 1981.
41. The membership of the Agreement includes that of the 1971 Yaoundé and Arusha Agreements.
42. I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXV

Article XXV

Joint Action by the Contracting Parties

1. Representatives of the contracting parties shall meet from time to time for the purpose of giving effect to those provisions of this Agreement which involve joint action and, generally, with a view to facilitating the operation and furthering the objectives of this Agreement. Wherever reference is made in this Agreement to the contracting parties acting jointly they are designated as the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

2. The Secretary-General of the United Nations is requested to convene the first meeting of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which shall take place not later than March 1, 1948.

3. Each contracting party shall be entitled to have one vote at all meetings of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

4. Except as otherwise provided for in this Agreement, decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast.

5. In exceptional circumstances not elsewhere provided for in this Agreement, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may waive an obligation imposed upon a contracting party by this Agreement; Provided that any such decision shall be approved by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast and that such majority shall comprise more than half of the contracting parties. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may also by such a vote

- (i) define certain categories of exceptional circumstances to which other voting requirements shall apply for the waiver of obligations, and
- (ii) prescribe such criteria as may be necessary for the application of this paragraph.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXV

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXV

1. Paragraph 1

(1) “provisions of this Agreement which involve joint action”

Authority for joint action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES is provided for in the following provisions of the General Agreement:

Articles II:6(a); VI:6(b) and (c); VII:1 and 4(c); VIII:2; X:3(c); XII:4(b) to (d) and 5; XIII:4; XIV:2; XV:1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8; XVI:5; XVII:4(c); XVIII:6, 7, 12, 14, 16, 19, 22; XIX:2, 3; XX:(h), (j); XXII:2; XXIII:2; XXIV:7, 10; XXV:1, 5; XXVII; XXVIII:1, 4; XXVIII bis:1; XXIX; XXX:2; XXXIII; XXXVII:2(b); XXXVIII:1, 2; Annex I, Notes Ad Articles XII:4, XVIII:15, 16, and XXVIII:1.

During the Second Session in 1948, in discussion of a proposed waiver decision, the question was raised whether a decision at a meeting of the CONTRACTING PARTIES would be adequate or whether it would be necessary to do a protocol to the General Agreement. The Chairman stated that “an action taken in accordance with the terms of an article could be effected by a decision approved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and duly recorded”.¹

(2) “CONTRACTING PARTIES”

The New York draft of the GATT provided for establishment of an Interim Trade Committee. In discussions at Geneva, in response to reluctance expressed regarding creation of a formal organization in advance of the ITO, it was proposed and accepted that all references to the “Committee” be replaced with references to the “Contracting Parties” and that these words be in initial capitals wherever they refer to joint action. This convention was later changed to “CONTRACTING PARTIES” for the sake of typographical clarity.² The organization created was nevertheless envisioned to be permanent in character.

On Geneva discussions, see EPCT/TAC/PV/11 (discussion regarding powers of the Committee), EPCT/TAC/PV/12 p. 2-5 (discussion and approval of change to “Contracting Parties”), EPCT/135 (draft of the General Agreement including this change), EPCT/209 (Legal and Drafting Committee Report on Part III of the General Agreement), EPCT/TAC/PV/25 p. 2-3, 12 (discussion and approval of change to CONTRACTING PARTIES, suggested in EPCT/209).

(3) “joint action ... with a view to facilitating the operation and furthering the objectives of this Agreement”

(a) Interpretation of the General Agreement

At the Second Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in September 1948, a Working Party on Modifications to the General Agreement examined which of the revisions to the ITO Charter which had been made at Havana should be brought into the General Agreement text by amendment. In support of the decision of the Working Party not to pick up every one of the changes, its Report notes that “if difficulties in application were to arise before the entry into force of the Charter, the CONTRACTING PARTIES would still have the possibility under the terms of Article XXV to settle such cases in the light of the provisions of Article XXIX, paragraph 1”.³

In 1949, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES interpreted the phrase “with a view to facilitating the operation and furthering the objectives of this Agreement” as “enabling the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly to interpret the Agreement whenever they saw fit. It was open for any government disagreeing with an interpretation to take the dispute which had given rise to such an interpretation to the International Court, although neither a government nor the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly could take a ruling of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Court”. The Chairman’s statement was not contested.⁴ In 1961, the Executive Secretary said “that it was within the functions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting jointly under Article XXV, to interpret the Agreement whenever they saw fit. It would be open for any government which disagreed with an interpretation to take the dispute which had given rise to the interpretation to the International Court of Justice, although neither a government nor the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly could take a ruling of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Court”.⁵

The Review Session Working Party on Organizational and Functional Questions in 1954-55 negotiated the text of an Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation. Article 3 of this Agreement on “Functions” provided in part that “no decision or other action of the Assembly or any subsidiary body of the Organization shall have the effect of imposing on any Member any new obligation which the Member has not specifically agreed to undertake”. In this connection, the Report of the Working Party notes that “It was ... agreed that an obligation arising from the operation or interpretation of a specific provision of the General Agreement ... including an interpretation that a particular obligation thereunder had become applicable, would not be the imposition of a ‘new obligation’ within the meaning of this paragraph”.⁶

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have followed different procedures for resolving questions of interpretation, such as Chairman’s rulings, Decisions by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, adoptions of reports of panels or working parties including interpretations, and decisions by the Council to interpret the General Agreement or to adopt reports including interpretations.

- Chairman’s rulings: Especially in the early days of the GATT, questions of interpretation were often resolved by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES giving a ruling, either at the request of a delegate⁷ or at his own initiative towards the end of a discussion⁸. These rulings sometimes did not meet dissenting opinions, and sometimes were expressly accepted⁹ or put to a roll-call vote.¹⁰ ³GATT/CP.2/22/Rev.1, adopted on 1 and 2 September 1948, II/39, 40.

⁴GATT/CP.3/SR.37, p. 5. In response to the suggestion of Cuba that the CONTRACTING PARTIES submit the legal aspects in dispute to an international court, the Chairman noted that “he wished to explain that the CONTRACTING PARTIES were not an organization authorized by the United Nations to request advisory opinions from the International Court of Justice. Advisory opinions from the Court may only be sought by the United Nations and by specialized agencies authorized to do so by the Assembly of the United Nations.” See further under Article XXIII concerning referral of disputes to the International Court.

- Decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES: The CONTRACTING PARTIES have in many instances adopted a decision, resolution or recommendation relating to a specific matter; sometimes such decisions included elements interpreting the General Agreement.¹¹
- Reports of Panels and Working Parties: Article XXIII:2 expressly gives the CONTRACTING PARTIES the power to “give a ruling”. This power has been exercised on occasion by the CONTRACTING PARTIES directly without a recommendation from another body.¹² The CONTRACTING PARTIES have adopted many reports of Panels or Working Parties which include interpretations of the General Agreement. Concerning the practice of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the field of dispute settlement, see Article XXIII.
- Council action: The Council did not adopt reports of Panels or Working Parties before 1968, but merely noted them for later adoption by the CONTRACTING PARTIES at their next Session. In November 1968 the CONTRACTING PARTIES at their Twenty-fifth Session agreed that the Council should undertake a wider range of work; since then the Council has directly adopted such reports.¹³
- Director-General: In a few cases, a request for a legal opinion has been addressed to the Director-General or his representative.¹⁴

(b) Consultations under Article XXV:1

The 1979 “Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance” provides “that Article XXV may, as recognized by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, inter alia, when they adopted the report of the Working Party on particular difficulties connected with trade in primary products (L/930) also afford an appropriate avenue for consultation and dispute settlement in certain circumstances”.¹⁵

The Report of the Working Party in 1959 on “Particular Difficulties Connected with Trade in Primary Commodities” considered actions taken to follow up on a 1956 Resolution on “Particular Difficulties Connected with Trade in Primary Commodities,” which had provided for consultations under Article XXII concerning commodity problems. The 1959 Report noted that:

“Paragraph 3 of the basic resolution has not been utilized, perhaps due to a lack of understanding of the potentialities of the General Agreement in facilitating consultations on trade problems of concern to individual contracting parties or the CONTRACTING PARTIES generally. Therefore the Working Party has thought it useful to describe the manner in which contracting parties may have recourse to the facilities of Articles XXII and XXV for dealing with problems in their trade in primary products ... there may be situations in which joint action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXV would be more appropriate [than consultations under Article XXII], for example, where a developing situation might lead to commercial policy measures being taken by one or more contracting parties which would be injurious to others unless it is dealt with by co-operative action. For a consultation to be initiated under Article XXV, there must be a prior decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES which could, if they wished, invite non-contracting parties to participate. Thus under these two Articles there are procedures, for initiating action and a search for solutions, which are well adapted for dealing with many of the special situations arising in the trade in primary products which could be more appropriately handled by GATT techniques than otherwise.

“Accordingly, the Working Party recommends that contracting parties, when contemplating action on problems arising in commodity trade, should consider the possibility of initiating consultations under Article XXII with a view to arriving at mutually acceptable solutions, thus avoiding the need for unilateral action. The CONTRACTING PARTIES are reminded that, when special circumstances are likely to affect the trade in a primary product and to threaten disruption of the market and to cause special difficulties either to exporters or to importers which might lead to commercial policy action being taken by one or more countries, they may, at the request of an interested party, decide to arrange for consultations among exporting and importing countries with a view to finding a solution which would avoid resort to measures which would restrict or disrupt trade. These consultations might be arranged pursuant to the provisions of Article XXV which enable them to act jointly with a view to furthering the objectives of the General Agreement.”¹⁶

In 1961 the CONTRACTING PARTIES conducted multilateral consultations under paragraph 1 of Article XXV on the difficulties experienced by New Zealand in marketing butter in the United Kingdom.¹⁷

(c) Political questions

In 1965, during the discussion of the request from the Government of the Republic of China (now known in the GATT and the WTO as the Separate Customs Territory of Taiwan, Penghu, Kinmen and Matsu, or Chinese Taipei¹⁸) to be represented by observers at sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES stated, inter alia, that

“it had been the policy of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to avoid unproductive controversies over political questions which did not bear significantly on the many substantial questions with which the CONTRACTING PARTIES were concerned. For this reason the CONTRACTING PARTIES had followed the policy expressed in Article 86 of the Havana Charter, namely to avoid passing judgment in any way on essentially political matters and to follow decisions of the United Nations on such questions.

“Consistently also with the practice of the United Nations, it was quite clear that for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to admit observers did not prejudice the position of the CONTRACTING PARTIES or of individual contracting parties towards recognition of the government in question. The Executive Secretary had based himself also upon the opinion of the Legal Department of the United Nations, which was that the question of representation in an international organization was distinct from the question of recognition of a government by other members of that organization.”¹⁹

In 1971, at the opening of the Twenty-seventh Session, the Chairman noted that in reaching their decision in 1965 to accede to the request of the Republic of China, the CONTRACTING PARTIES had agreed to follow decisions of the United Nations on essentially political matters, and suggested that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should follow the decision taken in United Nations Resolution 2758 (XXVI). It was agreed that for these reasons, representatives of the Republic of China should no longer attend sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES as observers.²⁰

In the Council in 1992, in discussion of the establishment of a working party on accession of Chinese Taipei to the General Agreement, the Chairman of the Council noted that “All contracting parties had acknowledged the view that there was only one China, as expressed in the United Nations General Assembly Resolution 2758 of 25 October 1971”. The Chairman stated that as part of the understanding reached on this matter, the titles carried by the representative of Chinese Taipei would not have any implication on the issue of sovereignty.²¹

The policy of following the decisions of the United Nations on political questions was also referred to in connection with the decision that the GATT observer status previously granted to the former USSR would be continued through the Russian Federation²² and the decision of the Council at its meeting on 16-17 June 1993 that in the light of United Nations General Assembly Resolution 47/1 “the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot continue automatically the contracting party status of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the GATT, and therefore decides that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for accession to the GATT and that it shall not participate in the work of the Council and its subsidiary bodies. The Council further invites other committees and subsidiary bodies of the GATT, including the Committees of the Tokyo Round Agreements and the Committee on Trade and Development, to take the necessary decisions in accordance with the above”.²³

(4) Competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES

(a) Commodity problems

In 1955, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES ruled that the CONTRACTING PARTIES were acting properly within the provisions of paragraph 1 of Article XXV in adopting recommendations relating to the study of commodity problems. This ruling was upheld by a formal vote of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.²⁴ This ruling was reaffirmed in a Resolution of 17 November 1956 on “Particular Difficulties Connected with Trade in Primary Commodities” which included the statement that “... the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in conformity with the functions conferred upon them under paragraph 1 of Article XXV and as recognized in the ruling of the tenth session, are competent to deal, upon the request of one or more contracting parties, with special difficulties arising in connexion with international trade in primary commodities ...”.²⁵

(b) Investment

In a Resolution of 4 March 1955 on “International Investment for Economic Development”, the CONTRACTING PARTIES, inter alia, “Recommend that the contracting parties who are in a position to provide capital for international investment and the contracting parties who desire to obtain such capital use their best endeavours to create conditions calculated to stimulate the international flow of capital having regard in particular, to the importance for this purpose of providing by appropriate methods for security for existing and future investment, the avoidance of double taxation, and facilities for the transfer of earnings upon foreign investments, and

“Urge that contracting parties upon the request of any contracting party enter into consultation or participate in negotiations directed to the conclusion of bilateral and multilateral agreements relating to these matters”.²⁶

During the Review Session of 1954-55 the CONTRACTING PARTIES considered a proposal to insert an article in the General Agreement on freedom of establishment.²⁷

(c) Disposal of surpluses

In a Resolution of 4 March 1955 on “Disposal of Surpluses”³¹ the CONTRACTING PARTIES, inter alia, “- Consider that when arranging the disposal of surplus agricultural products in world trade contracting parties should undertake a procedure of consultation with the principal suppliers of those products and other interested contracting parties, which would contribute to the orderly liquidation of such surpluses, including where practicable disposals designed to expand consumption of the products, and to the avoidance of prejudice to the interests of other contracting parties, and that they should give sympathetic consideration to the views expressed by other contracting parties in the course of such consultations.”

(d) Liquidation of strategic stocks

In a Resolution of 4 March 1955 on “Liquidation of Strategic Stocks”³² the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommended, inter alia:

“1. That, whenever practicable, any contracting party intending to liquidate a substantial quantity of such stocks should give at least forty-five days prior notice of such intention.

“2. That a contracting party, intending to liquidate and giving notice in accordance with paragraph 1, should consult fully with any contracting party which considers itself substantially interested and requests such consultations, with a view to avoiding or minimizing substantial injury to the economic interests of that contracting party and undue disruption of the markets for the product concerned and should give full and sympathetic consideration to the views expressed by such other interested contracting parties.”

(e) Restrictive business practices

At the Review Session of 1954-55, the CONTRACTING PARTIES considered and rejected a proposal to add to the General Agreement the provisions of Chapter V of the Havana Charter on cartels.³³ A 1958 Resolution by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on “Restrictive Business Practices”³⁴ appointed a Group of Experts. The 1960 Report of that Group of Experts to the CONTRACTING PARTIES on “Arrangements for Consultations” recommended that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should undertake to deal with restrictive business practices in international trade. The members of the Group agreed “that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should now be regarded as an appropriate and competent body to initiate action in this field ... and should encourage direct consultations between contracting parties with a view to the elimination of the harmful effects of particular restrictive practices”.³⁵ On 18 November 1960 the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided on arrangements for consultations concerning restrictive business practices.³⁶

The Report of the Working Party on the Accession of Poland notes: “It was pointed out in the Working Party that the Decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of 18 November 1960 on arrangements for consultations between contracting parties on restrictive business practices would automatically apply in the trade between Poland and other contracting parties”.³⁷

(f) Market disruption

In 1959, the United States drew attention to the fact that “sharp increases in imports, over a brief period of time and in a narrow range of commodities, could have serious economic, political and social repercussions in the importing countries. ... The problem was to find the means to alleviate the adverse effects of an abrupt invasion of established markets while continuing to provide steadily enlarged opportunities for trade".³⁸ The Report of a Working Party appointed in 1960 to consider the problems and to suggest solutions³⁹ was submitted to the seventeenth session containing the conclusion "that whether or not safeguards against situations of 'market disruption' were already available within the provisions of the General Agreement, there were political and psychological elements in the problem which rendered it doubtful whether such safeguards would be sufficient to lead some contracting parties which are dealing with these problems outside the framework of the General Agreement or in contravention of its provisions to abandon these exceptional methods at this time. In these circumstances the Working Party did not embark on interpretations of relevant provisions in the General Agreement".⁴⁰

(g) Minimum price arrangements

The following minimum price agreements have been reached in the framework of the General Agreement:

Arrangement Concerning Certain Dairy Products of 12 January 1970⁴¹, entered into force on 14 May 1970 and terminated on 11 May 1982;

Protocol Relating to Milk Fat of 2 April 1973⁴², entered into force on 14 May 1973 and terminated on 22 September 1980; and International Dairy Arrangement of 12 April 1979⁴³, in force since 1 January 1980.

(h) Taxation and trade

In the Review Session of 1954-55, the CONTRACTING PARTIES considered a proposal to add to the General Agreement an article on double taxation.⁴⁴

In 1968, the Council, acting under paragraph 1 of Article XXV, established a Working Party to examine the provisions of the General Agreement relevant to border tax adjustments, the practices of contracting parties in relation to such adjustments and the possible effects of such adjustments on international trade.⁴⁵ During its meetings the Working Party examined the nature of direct and indirect taxes and their effects on international trade, and deliberated on standards for their adjustment at the border. See the 1971 Report of the Working Party on "Border Tax Adjustments".⁴⁶ Following the report, the Council introduced on a provisional basis a notification procedure and established a consultation procedure whereby, upon request, a multilateral consultation could take place on changes in tax adjustments. No such consultation has so far been requested.⁴⁷

(i) Environmental measures and international trade

On November 1971, the Council established a Group on Environmental Measures and International Trade to examine, upon request, any specific matters relevant to the trade policy aspects of measures to control pollution and protect human environment. The Group was re-activated in 1991 and met from then until early 1994.⁴⁸ Concerning the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the area of the environment, see the minutes of the

(j) Government procurement

The Agreement on Government Procurement of 12 April 1979 was concluded, inter alia, in recognition of “the need to establish an agreed international framework of rights and obligations with respect to laws, regulations, procedures and practices regarding government procurement with a view to achieving greater liberalization and expansion of world trade and improving the international framework for the conduct of world trade”.⁵⁰ A new Agreement on Government Procurement was negotiated and concluded on 15 April 1994, appears in Annex IV of the WTO Agreement, and will enter into force on 1 January 1996.

(k) Services, including transport insurance

In the Review Session of 1954-55, the CONTRACTING PARTIES considered proposals relating to discrimination in transport insurance⁵¹. A Recommendation by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of May 1959 on “Freedom of Contract in Transport Insurance”⁵² recognized that restrictive measures in regard to transport insurance were a matter that should be regarded as a subject of interest to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

See the Ministerial Declaration of 1982⁵³ and the Ministerial Declaration on the Uruguay Round, which states that: “Negotiations in this area shall aim to establish a multilateral framework of principles and rules for trade in services, including elaboration of possible disciplines for individual sectors, with a view to expansion of such trade under conditions of transparency and progressive liberalization and as a means of promoting economic growth of all trading partners and the development of developing countries. Such framework shall respect the policy objectives of national laws and regulations applying services and shall take into account the work of relevant international organizations.”⁵⁴ A General Agreement on Trade in Services was negotiated in the Uruguay Round and constitutes Annex 1B of the WTO Agreement.

(1) Scope of the waiver power

At the First Session of the Preparatory Committee in London in October 1946, in Committee V on organizational arrangements, one delegation proposed that the waiver authority in the draft ITO Charter be extended to cover not just the commercial policy obligations, as originally proposed, but all Charter obligations. Queried concerning the purpose of this provision, the United States delegate stated,

“... it was the thought of the U.S. in drafting this section that members would take advantage of such escapes as exist in the rest of the charter first, and this was meant merely to cover cases which were exceptional and caused particular hardship to any particular member and were not covered by the other escapes provided in the charter. This is to cover cases which are not covered elsewhere.”⁵⁶

The discussion is summarized in the London Report:

“In discussing the powers of the Conference to suspend, in exceptional circumstances, obligations undertaken by members under the general commercial policy provisions, it was suggested that this power might be extended to cover all obligations under the Charter. It was stressed that the waiving of such obligations was intended to apply only in cases of an exceptional nature, involving hardship to a particular member, which were not covered by specific escape clauses. It was finally agreed that all the obligations undertaken by members, pursuant to the Charter, should come within the purview of this general provision.”⁵⁷

The Report of the Working Party in 1952 on “The European Coal and Steel Community” notes:

“... The Working Party considered ... whether it would be appropriate to grant a waiver under paragraph 5(a) of Article XXV, in order to permit the six countries to participate in the European Coal and Steel Community without violating their obligations under the General Agreement. The Working Party concluded ... that such action would be appropriate. The Working Party is of the view that the text of paragraph 5(a) of Article XXV is general in character; it allows the CONTRACTING PARTIES to waive any obligations imposed upon the contracting parties by the Agreement in exceptional circumstances not provided for in the Agreement, and places no limitations on the exercise of that right. ...

“The Working Party recognized, however, that it would be appropriate for the CONTRACTING PARTIES, before granting a waiver under paragraph 5(a) of Article XXV, to consider whether the objectives of the European Coal and Steel Community were consistent with those of the General Agreement. The Working Party examined the provisions of the Treaty which define the objectives of the European Coal and Steel Community and it appeared to the Working Party that those objectives were broadly consistent with the objectives of the General Agreement.”⁵⁸

The Report of the 1955 Review Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration” records the request by the representative of Cuba for a legal opinion as to whether the CONTRACTING PARTIES could grant, by the majority specified in paragraph 5(a) of Article XXV, a waiver from obligations which a contracting party had assumed under Part I of the Agreement. The Executive Secretary noted that this question had been addressed in the Working Party Report on the European Coal and Steel Community and gave his opinion that the CONTRACTING PARTIES could grant such a waiver by a two-thirds majority.⁵⁹ The considerations which had led the Executive Secretary to this interpretation were subsequently presented in a Secretariat note, which referred to the following arguments:

“In the absence of any other qualification the words ‘may waive an obligation’ [in Article XXV:5(a)] must refer to any obligation under the Agreement. If the drafters had intended this power to be limited to Parts II and III of the Agreement it would have been a simple matter to include such a qualification. This was not done.

“The phrase ‘Except where provision for modification is made elsewhere ...’ [in Article XXX:1] provides a clear exception for action taken under the provisions of Article XXV:5(a), for

- (i) if the waiver of an obligation in Part I is not considered to represent a ‘modification’ it can hardly be a change that would require the application of the amendment procedure; and
- (ii) if such a waiver is considered to be a ‘modification’, this phrase provides an explicit exception from the unanimity requirement for amendment for Part I. ...

“From the above analysis it appears -

- (a) that the CONTRACTING PARTIES intentionally made a distinction in the Agreement between an amendment and a waiver granted in exceptional circumstances;
- (b) that they made an effort to avoid the possibility of conflict between Article XXX and other Articles by writing an exception in Article XXX;
- (c) that they explicitly decided that the provisions of Article XXV:5(a) may be applied to any obligation under the Agreement; and
- (d) that they have, in many cases, granted waivers of obligations of Part I by less than a unanimous vote.”⁶⁰

At the Tenth Session in 1955, the representative of Cuba again put forward his Government’s objections to the granting of waivers from obligations under Part I of the General Agreement. The Intersessional Committee considered the matter on the basis, inter alia, of the Note cited above, and in its Report recommended that the CONTRACTING PARTIES “should affirm their intention to proceed with caution in considering requests for a waiver from obligations in Part I or from other important obligations of the Agreement, and to take appropriate measures to safeguard the interests of contracting parties”.⁶¹ See below for the Decision of 1 November 1956 adopted as a follow-up to this Report.

(2) Procedures

In recent years a request to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for a waiver has generally been followed by a Council decision as to whether to establish a working party. Except in those cases where consensus had been reached on the waiver text, a working party has been established; after examining the measures for which the waiver was sought (normally through a question and answer process) and the “exceptional circumstances” claimed, the working party has drafted its report and the terms of the waiver decision.⁶² The report has on occasion included additional material interpreting the terms and conditions attached to the waiver. The report and the draft text of the waiver decision have been adopted by the Council which then has recommended the adoption of the decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by a vote. The vote has taken place either at a Session or by postal or telegraphic ballot.

At the Eleventh Session, on 1 November 1956 the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Decision on “Article XXV - Guiding Principles to be followed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in considering applications for waivers from Part I or other important obligations of the Agreement”.⁶³ These procedures provide as follows:

⁶²See, for example, the Report on “United States Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act”, L/5708, adopted on 6-8 and 20 November 1984, 31S/180.

⁶³5S/25.

“(a) Applications for waivers from Part I or other important obligations of the General Agreement should be considered only if submitted with at least thirty days’ notice. It is recognized, however, that in exceptional cases calling for urgent action this requirement may, by general agreement, be relaxed.

“(b) In the interval afforded by such notice, the applicant contracting party should give full consideration to representations made to it by other contracting parties and engage in full consultation with them.

“(c) The CONTRACTING PARTIES when examining an application should give careful consideration to any representations that such consultations had proved unsatisfactory, and in general should not grant an application in cases where they are not satisfied that the legitimate interests of other contracting parties are adequately safeguarded.

“(d) Any decision granting a waiver should include procedures for future consultation on specific action taken under the waiver, and, where appropriate, for arbitration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES

“(e) Any such decision should also provide for an annual report and, where appropriate, for an annual review of the operation of the waiver.”⁶⁴

During debate in the GATT Council and in a waiver working party on the United States request for a waiver for duty-free treatment provided under the US Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act of 1983, in spite of differences of view as to whether it was appropriate to employ the waiver procedure under Article XXV:5 (as opposed to other procedural approaches) to establish a preferential scheme such as this one, “it was acknowledged that a decision on whether to ask for a waiver ... could only be made by the United States. The United States therefore requested that the draft waiver ... be submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for a vote”.⁶⁵

As for the role of a working party in examining a waiver request and drafting the waiver decision, the 1993 Report of the Working Party on “German Unification - Transitional Measures Adopted by the European Communities” provides as follows:

“... The Working Party noted that the established practice of the CONTRACTING PARTIES with respect to waiver working parties had been either to establish a working party to examine the waiver request and to draft the text of the waiver decision, or (when such an examination was deemed unnecessary or inappropriate) to make a decision without establishing any working party. The Working Party recalled that its establishment had been a departure from this practice; as a result its work had consisted essentially of increasing transparency, and its conclusions were necessarily limited. Some members of the Working Party regretted this departure and emphasised that they did not regard it as establishing a precedent.”⁶⁶

The 1993 Report of the Working Party on “United States Andean Trade Preference Act” also noted the view of members of the Working Party that “working party examination of the appropriateness of a waiver and its terms should take place prior to the granting of a waiver.”⁶⁷

In May 1993, in discussion of a waiver request, the Council approved the text of the draft decision directly without referring the request to a working party, and recommended its adoption by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by a vote by postal ballot. In this connection the Council Chairman noted that “the decision, when and if adopted by a vote by postal ballot, would be circulated as usual in an L/ series document ... Furthermore, the effective date of the Waiver Decision would be the date of its adoption. As representatives were aware, when voting by postal ballot, contracting parties were customarily given 30 days in which to cast their votes. Accordingly, the effective date of this decision would be the date at which the requisite majority was obtained, but not later than the ⁶⁴However, the following year the Working Party on “Consultations under Article XII:4(b)” examined the waivers of Article XV:6 which had been granted to Czechoslovakia and New Zealand, and “came to the conclusion that the nature of the subject-matter of these waivers being somewhat distinct from other matters covered by waivers, did not seem to require regular consultations”. The Working Party recommended that these waivers be amended so as to dispense with the annual consultation requirement. L/769, adopted on 30 November 1957, 6S/36, 38, paras. 8-10.

See also the reference above at page 874 concerning the confirmation by the Chairman during the Second Session in 1948 that in the case of a waiver under Article XXV:5, a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES is sufficient, and a Protocol is not required.

(3) “In exceptional circumstances”

In 1970, Greece requested a waiver of its obligations under Article I for preferential tariff quotas granted to the USSR. The purpose of the tariff quotas was to offset the competitive disadvantage which imports of USSR products faced vis-a-vis imports of EEC products due to tariff reductions under the EEC-Greece Association Agreement, and thus to facilitate Greek exports to the USSR under a bilateral payments agreement. The Report of the Working Party on “Greece— Preferential Tariff Quotas to the USSR” notes that “it was considered that the Greek bilateral payments position with the USSR did not constitute ‘exceptional circumstances’ in the sense of Article XXV:5.”⁶⁹

“The Working Party, with the exception of one member, expressed serious concern over the action taken by Greece which had led it to request a waiver from its obligations under Article I. The members concerned considered that the question of principle and precedent was of utmost importance. While expressing sympathy for and understanding the difficulties encountered by Greece, they were not convinced that exceptional circumstances as required under Article XXV:5 existed and therefore were opposed to granting of a waiver. In their view, Greece should consider terminating the Special Protocol or extending the tariff concessions on a most-favoured-nation basis, at an early date.”⁷⁰

“A large majority of the members of the Working Party does not recommend that a waiver be granted as requested by the Government of Greece.”⁷¹

The Report of the Working Party on “United States Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act” notes, inter alia, the following views:

“Some members stated that in their view the exceptional circumstances referred to in paragraph 5 of Article XXV had not been established. A deviation from the m.f.n. principle on the basis of geographical and non-economic considerations had to be well justified. These members considered that compliance with the criteria specified in paragraph 3 of the Enabling Clause was per se not sufficient to warrant the granting of a waiver. One member noted that the CONTRACTING PARTIES had not defined what constituted the exceptional circumstances referred to in Article XXV:5 and that each contracting party would consider the question individually when deciding how to vote on the proposed waiver. The representative of the United States said that the exceptional circumstances justifying the waiver were basically economic and legal: (i) the economic recovery of the fragile economies of the region required trade policies aimed at achieving sustained investment and growth rates, and (ii) the CBERA established a programme not covered by the provisions of the Enabling Clause, though consistent with its objectives, which required a GATT framework.”⁷²

“The Working Party recognized that there are a number of different approaches within the GATT framework to the establishment of preferential schemes and that each case must be analysed on the basis of all the circumstances peculiar to it. Having considered these alternative approaches in this case, a number of members of the Working Party concluded that the waiver procedure under paragraph 5 of Article XXV was the most appropriate alternative with respect to the CBERA. However, others were of the view that this was not the case. Notwithstanding these differing views, it was acknowledged that a decision on whether to request a waiver for the CBERA could only be made by the United States. The United States therefore requested that the draft waiver annexed to this report be submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for a vote.”⁷³

The waiver requested by the United States was granted in a Decision of 15 February 1985.⁷⁴

(4) Effect of waivers

The 1962 Panel Report on the “Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII” includes the following footnote regarding “prima facie nullification or impairment”:

“It may be noted in this connexion that the status of a measure (that is, whether or not it is consistent with GATT) is not to be affected by a waiver decision taken subsequently. In fact, Decisions taken under Article XXV:5 granting waivers from GATT obligations have normally expressly provided for the continued validity of the procedures of Article XXIII in respect of the otherwise ‘waived’ obligations (cf. inter alia BISD, Third Supplement, pages 35-41; Eighth Supplement, page 22)”⁷⁵.

The 1990 Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products Applied Under the 1955 Waiver and Under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions”⁷⁶ examined quantitative restrictions on sugar-containing products, which it found were inconsistent with the obligations of the United States under Article XI:1 but in conformity with the terms of a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES waiving that obligation in accordance with Article XXV:5. The Panel found that “Since both Article XI:1 and Article XXV:5 form part of the General Agreement, the imposition of the restrictions in conformity with the Waiver cannot constitute a ‘failure of [the United States] to carry out its obligations under this Agreement’ within the meaning of Article XXIII:1(a).

“... the fact that the restrictions found to be inconsistent with Article XI:1 conform to the terms of the Waiver does not prevent the EEC from bringing a complaint under Article XXIII:1(b) of the General Agreement but it is up to the EEC to demonstrate that a nullification or impairment of benefits accruing to it under the General Agreement has resulted from these restrictions.”⁷⁷

The same Panel Report also discusses arguments made by the parties concerning the significance of the Uruguayan Recourse footnote above. The Panel findings provide:

“The Panel ... examined the implication of the note in the report on the Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII, according to which ‘... the status of a measure (that is, whether or not it is inconsistent with GATT) is not affected by a waiver decision ...’. The Panel noted that the panel which submitted this report had examined import restrictions imposed by Germany and that Germany had obtained a waiver for the restrictions but nevertheless insisted that they were covered by the existing legislation clause in the protocol by which it acceded to the General Agreement (BISD 8S/31 and 10S/126). Against this background the footnote can be understood to suggest that a decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to waive an obligation for a particular measure does not constitute a ruling by the CONTRACTING PARTIES that the measure is inconsistent with the General Agreement and that, consequently, a contracting party having obtained a waiver for a particular measure is not barred from arguing in proceedings under Article XXIII:2 that the measure would be consistent with the General Agreement even in the absence of the waiver. The footnote therefore does not support the conclusion that a contracting party imposing a measure inconsistent with a particular provision of the General Agreement but covered by the terms of a decision waiving the obligations under that provision in accordance with Article XXV:5 nevertheless fails to carry out its obligations under the General Agreement within the meaning of Article XXIII:1(a). The footnote can in the view of the Panel however be taken as an indication of the fact that a measure inconsistent with a particular provision of the General Agreement remains inconsistent with that particular provision even if the CONTRACTING PARTIES authorized in accordance with Article XXV:5 in exceptional circumstances the maintenance of the measure subject to specified conditions.”⁷⁸

(5) Notification, consultation and dispute settlement with respect to waivers

The 1956 Procedures for considering waivers referred to above at page 883 provide that “Any decision granting a waiver should include procedures for future consultation on specific action taken under the waiver, and, where appropriate, for arbitration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. ...”⁷⁹ Some waiver decisions explicitly provide for the possibility of “recourse to the appropriate provisions of Article XXIII”.⁸⁰ Other waiver decisions include special provisions on consultation and dispute settlement which do not explicitly refer to Article XXIII.⁸¹ There have been some cases of invocation of such special dispute settlement procedures, for instance in connection with the waiver to the United Kingdom in connection with items traditionally admitted duty-free from countries of the Commonwealth.⁸²

See also material under Article XXIII concerning the relationship between Article XXIII and Article XXV.

(6) Waivers granted under Article XXV:5

As of 1 January 1995, there had been 115 original waiver decisions by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, as well as many other waiver decisions extending or amending a prior waiver decision. A list of all waiver decisions appears at the end of this chapter.

There are two instances when a waiver was requested but not granted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. One concerned a request in 1969 by the EEC for a waiver from its obligations under Article I in order to reduce the customs duties in respect of certain citrus fruit originating from Israel and Spain.⁸³ Another case concerned the request (referred to above) by Greece in 1970 for a waiver from Article I in connection with tariff preferences for certain manufactured products imported from the USSR within specific quota limits.⁸⁴

(7) Extension of a waiver under Article XXV:5

The 1993 Report of the Working Party on the “Andean Trade Preference Act” notes the view of the Working Party that “any extension of the ATPA to new beneficiary countries and to additional products would require a new waiver request”.⁸⁵

(8) Termination of a waiver under Article XXV:5

Concerning the possibility of modifying or terminating a waiver that does not contain an expiration date, the Panel Report on “United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products Applied under the 1955 Waiver and under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions” includes the following finding:

“The Panel, while concluding that the United States had not acted in contradiction with the terms, conditions and procedures of the Waiver by imposing quantitative limitations on imports of sugar-containing products, considered that the CONTRACTING PARTIES, when they granted the Waiver in 1955, may not have expected that the United States would make use of Section 22 in the manner described in paragraphs 5.10 to 5.12 above nor that the United States would pursue a sugar policy of the kind currently pursued, given the assurances analysed in paragraphs 5.14 to 5.15 above. The power of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to grant waivers under Article XXV:5 implies the power to withdraw or modify the waivers granted. The questions of whether the United States uses Section 22 in a manner expected by the CONTRACTING PARTIES when they granted the Waiver and of whether it acts in accordance with the assurances in consideration of which the CONTRACTING PARTIES granted the Waiver may be relevant for a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to withdraw or modify the Waiver. However, it is not the mandate of panels established under Article XXIII:2 to propose changes in GATT provisions, but to make findings regarding the interpretation and application of the existing provisions (cf. BISD 35S/241; L/6568, page 21), and the Panel therefore did not address the question of a withdrawal or modification of the Waiver.”⁸⁶

Termination of an existing waiver was also discussed in the 1984 Report of the Working Party on “US Import Restrictions on Agricultural Products”.⁸⁷

B. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE XXV:5 AND OTHER GATT PROVISIONS

1. Article XXX

See the discussion at page 882 regarding the issue raised by Cuba in the Ninth and Tenth Sessions, regarding whether the granting of waivers with respect to obligations under Part I was inconsistent with the amendment provisions of Article XXX, which provide that amendments to the provisions of Part I may only become effective upon acceptance by all the contracting parties.

2. The “Enabling Clause”

The 1983 request by the USA for a waiver for the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (CBERA)⁸⁸ notes that “the United States’ request is made in accordance with footnote 2 of paragraph 2 of the Framework Agreement and paragraph 5 of Article XXV of the General Agreement”. In reply to a question, this reference to the 1979 GATT Decision on “Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries” was explained by the US as follows:

“The United States has interpreted ‘the GATT provisions for joint action’ in footnote 2 of paragraph 2 of the Enabling Clause as referring to provisions of the GATT, including the general waiver provision contained in paragraph 5 of Article XXV which deals with joint action by contracting parties. It was for this reason that the United States cited both footnote 2 of paragraph 2 of the Enabling Clause and paragraph 5 of Article XXV in its waiver request.”⁸⁹

During the meeting of the Working Party on the US Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act on 10 April 1984, the Legal Advisor to the Director-General pointed out in response to a request for clarification

⁸⁶L/6631, adopted on 7 November 1990, 37S/228, 259, para. 5.16.

“that the interpretation of GATT provisions was not within the competence of the Secretariat; only the CONTRACTING PARTIES could give legally valid interpretations. On that understanding he said that, although in his opinion the words ‘the GATT provisions for joint action’ in footnote 2 could be interpreted as referring to the provisions of Article XXV, paragraph 1, he had been assured that the drafters of the text had intended the phrase to refer to the waiver procedure in Article XXV, paragraph 5, as being appropriate to cover such special and differential treatment. He recalled, however, that the only agreement which had previously been notified with reference to the footnote, SPARTECA, had not been dealt with as a waiver case. He did not think that the footnote should be interpreted as referring to Article XXXVIII which did not contain any procedural provisions.”⁹⁰

The Report of the Working Party on “United States Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act” notes:

“At the request of the Working Party, the representative of the secretariat described the Secretariat’s understanding of the meaning of footnote 2 of paragraph 2 of the Enabling Clause. In brief, the Enabling Clause provided authority or cover only for the kinds of preferential treatment described therein. Footnote 2 of paragraph 2 of the Enabling Clause recognized that there could be other situations involving preferential treatment not falling within the scope of paragraph 2 which the CONTRACTING PARTIES might wish to cover under the GATT provisions for joint action. The provisions in question could not be those of Part IV, including Article XXXVIII thereof, as these did not provide authority for preferential treatment. The joint action envisaged had to be in terms of paragraph 5 of Article XXV irrespective of whether this was specifically mentioned or not.”⁹¹

The Report of the Working Party on the “Third ACP-EEC Convention of Lomé” records the response of the spokesman for the ACP States to the question of why the EC had not sought a waiver from Article XXV obligations for the Lomé Convention as the United States had done for the Caribbean Basin Initiative. The ACP spokesman stated that the Convention had been agreed on the basis of full equality between the ACP States and the EC and that all the parties believed that the Convention was in full conformity with the General Agreement including Part IV thereof.⁹²

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

Institutional provisions: The institutional provisions of the US Charter appear in Chapter VII; in the London Draft Charter in Chapter VIII; in the New York Draft Charter in Chapter VIII; in the Geneva Draft Charter in Chapter VII; and in the Havana Charter in Chapter VII. All Charter drafts except the Havana Charter included provision for a committee within the ITO which would be composed of Members having made effective the General Agreement. The concept of a body to administer the General Agreement appeared first in Annexure 10 of the London Report, on giving effect to certain provisions of the Charter by means of a General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade among the members of the Preparatory Committee. Annexure 10 noted that certain provisions of such an agreement required for their successful operation the existence of an international body, and proposed that a provisional international agency be created which would go out of existence upon establishment of the ITO.⁹³ The New York draft of the GATT provided for establishment of an Interim Trade Committee.⁹⁴ In discussions at Geneva the references were changed to “CONTRACTING PARTIES”: see page 874.⁹⁵ The organization created was nevertheless envisioned to be permanent in character. Although Article XXIX provides for suspension of Part II upon entry into force of the Havana Charter, Article XXV would not be thus suspended, and the CONTRACTING PARTIES were intended to have a continuing role in the oversight of Parts I and III.

Waiver provisions: In the 1946 US Draft Charter, Article 55:2 provided for waiver authority, by two-thirds vote, for the obligations in Chapter IV of the Draft Charter (general commercial policy). Article 66(2) of the London Draft Charter provided for waiver authority for any obligation in the Charter. This provision was kept, with no substantive changes as to scope, as Article 66:2 of the New York Draft Charter. The New York draft of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade included an Article XXII on the functions and structure of the Interim Trade Committee, including a provision on waiver of any obligation by two-thirds vote.⁹⁶ The waiver provision was then reformulated in GATT Article XXV:5(a) and the parallel provisions of Article 74:3 of the Geneva Draft Charter, to provide that the exceptional circumstances in which a waiver may be granted are those “not elsewhere provided for” in GATT or the Charter.⁹⁷ An almost-identical text on waivers appears in Article 77:3 of the Havana Charter.

The text of Article XXV in the General Agreement as agreed on 30 October 1947 was identical to the present text. During the first session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which was held at the Havana Conference, it was agreed (in connection with changes in Articles XXXII, XXXIII and XXXV, described infra under Article XXXV) to add subparagraphs 5(b) through (d), which permitted the CONTRACTING PARTIES to authorize one contracting party to withhold the benefit of concessions in its Schedule from another contracting party determined to have “failed without sufficient justification to carry out with [the complaining] contracting party negotiations of the kind described in paragraph 1 of Article 17 of the Havana Charter”. If concessions referred were withheld, the contracting party subject to such withholding would then be free to withdraw from the General Agreement on sixty days’ notice. This provision would not apply as between any two contracting parties the Schedules of which contained concessions initially negotiated between them.⁹⁸ Paragraph 17:1 of the Havana Charter referred to “negotiations directed to the substantial reduction of the general levels of tariffs and other charges on imports and exports, and to the elimination of the preferences referred to in paragraph 2 of Article 16 [corresponding to GATT Article I:2] on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis”. At the Review Session in 1954-55 it was agreed to delete subparagraphs 5(b)-(d). This deletion was effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement, which entered into force October 1957. The Report of the Review Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration” noted in this connection:

“The Working Party recommends the deletion of paragraphs 5(b), (c) and (d). During the six years that the provision of sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) had been applicable, no contracting party has had recourse to them and, with one exception, no member of the Working party supported their retention. The representative of Cuba opposed their deletion on the ground that they constitute a right which contracting parties have under the Agreement and this right should not be withdrawn and reserved the position of his government. As a consequential amendment the words ‘without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 5(b) of Article XXV’ should be deleted from Article XXXV.”⁹⁹

V. WAIVERS GRANTED BY THE CONTRACTING PARTIES UNDER ARTICLE XXV:5

Updated to 1 January 1995. Notes appear following the table. For those waivers which were still in effect on 1 January 1995, the "date of expiry" cell is shaded. In certain instances, measures covered by a waiver may also fall within the scope of a later decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, such as the Decision of 29 November 1979 on Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries ("Enabling Clause").

NOTES:

1. These tariff preferences are now granted within the framework of the Papua New Guinea/Australia Trade and Commercial Relations Agreement, which entered into force on 1 February 1977 and was notified under Article XXIV (L/5138).
2. Article XXVIII:1, as amended by paragraph 6 of the Torquay Protocol, did not permit modification or withdrawal of concessions prior to 1 January 1954; this waiver permitted earlier renegotiation.
3. Renegotiation under Article XXVIII (conversion of nomenclature) was notified in 1958 (SECRET/101, Rev.1 and Add.1-2). Cuba completed renegotiation of Part I of its Schedule IX in connection with its conversion to HS nomenclature: renegotiation of Part II of Schedule IX has not yet been completed.
4. The Czech and Slovak Republic ceased to exist on 31 December 1993.
5. France was granted a waiver from the provisions of Article XXIV:5 in order to permit France to enter a customs union with Italy, which was not a contracting party. At the time of the waiver, Article XXIV did not include the changes made at Havana: see Section III in the chapter on Article XXIV.
6. Waiver was granted to France and Germany for special treatment applied in their trade relations with the Saar, and expired when EEC intra-trade became duty-free in 1970 (C/M60).
7. Waiver applies to those products not covered by the Cooperation Agreement between the EEC and Morocco (Exchange of letters attached to Final Act, L/4381).
8. Waiver was required because Indonesia ceased to be a member of the IMF; however, Indonesia resumed IMF membership in 1967. See Article XV:6 in this Index.
9. The waiver in question permitted retention of import restrictions notified by Italy under Article XVIII:11 (as amended in 1948) pending a decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XVIII:12. The notification was withdrawn by Italy in late 1950: see GATT/CP.5/SR.23 p. 3, GATT/CP.5/29.
10. Luxembourg liberalized all products covered by the waiver as from 1 May 1970 (L/3452).
11. The waiver from the base dates under Article I:4, which was granted to the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, is now applicable to Malawi: Malawi acceded to the GATT under Article XXVI:5(c) and thereby committed itself to the tariff concessions specified in Schedule XVI - Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, which constituted from that time Schedule LVIII - Malawi.
12. Article XVIII:6 in the 30 October 1947 text of the General Agreement (prior to the replacement of Article XVIII which took place in 1949) permitted retention of any non-discriminatory measure if it affected unbound items only and had been in force as of 1 September 1947, and if the contracting party had by 10 October 1947 notified the products to which the measure applied as well as its nature and purpose, and if it had notified the measure to the CONTRACTING PARTIES within sixty days after it had become a contracting party. The decisions of 14 September 1948 granted waivers to the UK and the Netherlands in respect of the dates of notification and operation: see GATT/CP.2/38, GATT/CP.2/SR.25. This provision of Article XVIII became paragraph 11 in the text as amended in 1948, and was eliminated when Article XVIII was revised in the 1954 Review Session.
13. Waiver was required because New Zealand was neither a member of the IMF nor had entered into a special exchange agreement. New Zealand became a member of the IMF in 1961; see material under Article XV:6 in this Index.
14. Waiver was required when New Zealand was not a member of the IMF. New Zealand became a member of the Fund effective 31 August 1961. See under Article XV:6 in this book.
15. Waiver has expired and products concerned have been included in New Zealand's GSP scheme (L/4444 and L/4366).
16. The temporary duty increase was terminated for all but two items, in the process of alignment of external customs duties under the Central American Economic Integration (L/2256).
17. The renegotiations required as a consequence of the tariff changes were not carried out.
18. The waiver from the base dates under Article I:4, granted to Australia and South Africa, applied only in respect of imports from the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland.
19. Prior to the Decision of 25 November 1968, the waiver included temporary duty increases inconsistent with Article II. As some of these changes resulted in margins of preference higher than those existing on 10 April 1947, the scope of the waiver was increased to include Article I:4.
20. See note above concerning Netherlands waiver of 14 September 1948.
21. The waiver decision of 20 November 1958 permitted extension of preferences granted in the original decision to the Portuguese territories of Mozambique and Angola.
22. It is not clear whether the Government of Zimbabwe continues to grant tariff preferences for these products.
23. This waiver, granted to the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland covered all imports specified in the Decision of 1 July 1955, which introduced new tariff levels.

24. The original text of Part II of Article XX, a group of three transitional exceptions intended for the immediate postwar period, permitted maintenance of measures inconsistent with other provisions of the General Agreement, until such time as the conditions giving rise to them had ceased, and not later than 1 January 1951. The waiver extended the time limit contained in this provision of the Article. See Section III under Article XX and the discussion in that chapter of Article XX(j).
25. The "GSP Waiver" expired on 25 June 1981, but was not renewed in view of the 1979 Enabling Clause decision: see under Article I in this Index.
26. The most recent annual report of the Committee of Participating Countries under this Protocol (L/7106) states: "The Protocol is applied under the provisions of the Enabling Clause, and in particular under the terms of its paragraph 2(c)." See discussion of this Protocol under Article I in this Index.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXVI AND ANNEX H

Article XXVI

Acceptance, Entry into Force and Registration

1. The date of this Agreement shall be 30 October 1947.
2. This Agreement shall be open for acceptance by any contracting party which, on 1 March 1955, was a contracting party or was negotiating with a view to accession to this Agreement.

3. This Agreement, done in a single English original and a single French original, both texts authentic, shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who shall furnish certified copies thereof to all interested governments.

4. Each government accepting this Agreement shall deposit an instrument of acceptance with the Executive Secretary to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, who will inform all interested governments of the date of deposit of each instrument of acceptance and of the day on which this Agreement enters into force under paragraph 6 of this Article.

5. (a) Each government accepting this Agreement does so in respect of its metropolitan territory and of the other territories for which it has international responsibility, except such separate customs territories as it shall notify to the Executive Secretary to the CONTRACTING PARTIES at the time of its own acceptance.

(b) Any government, which has so notified the Executive Secretary under the exceptions in subparagraph (a) of this paragraph, may at any time give notice to the Executive Secretary that its acceptance shall be effective in respect of any separate customs territory or territories so excepted and such notice shall take effect on the thirtieth day following the day on which it is received by the Executive Secretary.

(c) If any of the customs territories, in respect of which a contracting party has accepted this Agreement, possesses or acquires full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in this Agreement, such territory shall, upon sponsorship through a declaration by the responsible contracting party establishing the above-mentioned fact, be deemed to be a contracting party.

6. This Agreement shall enter into force, as among the governments which have accepted it, on the thirtieth day following the day on which instruments of acceptance have been deposited with the Executive Secretary to the CONTRACTING PARTIES on behalf of governments named in Annex H, the territories of which account for 85 per centum of the total external trade of the territories of such governments, computed in accordance with the applicable column of percentages set forth therein. The instrument of acceptance of each other government shall take effect on the thirtieth day following the day on which such instrument has been deposited.

7. The United Nations is authorized to effect registration of this Agreement as soon as it enters into force.

ANNEX H
PERCENTAGE SHARES OF TOTAL EXTERNAL TRADE TO BE USED FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAKING THE DETERMINATION REFERRED TO IN ARTICLE XXVI

(based on the average of 1949-1953)

If, prior to the accession of the Government of Japan to the General Agreement, the present Agreement has been accepted by contracting parties the external trade of which under Column I accounts for the percentage of such trade specified in paragraph 6 of Article XXVI, Column I shall be applicable for the purposes of that paragraph. If the present Agreement has not been so accepted prior to the accession of the Government of Japan, Column II shall be applicable for the purposes of that paragraph.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXVI

A. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXVI

1. Paragraph 1: “date of this Agreement”

References to the “date of this Agreement” appear in:

- Articles II:1(b) and II:1(c) (specifying the operative date for the binding of “other duties and charges” with respect to items in regular or preferential schedules of concessions);
- Article II:6 (fixing the base date for par values of currencies, for application of provisions on adjustment of specific duties in the event of a reduction in par value); and
- Articles V:6, VII:4(d), and X:3(c) (permitting retention of measures existing on the “date of this Agreement” with respect to direct consignment requirements, currency conversion for customs valuation purposes, or review of administrative action relating to customs matters).

The date specified in Article XXVI:1, 30 October 1947, applies for the purposes of Article II to concessions made in the round of tariff negotiations held in 1947. The same date applies to the obligations under Articles V:6, VII:4(d) and X:3(c) of the original contracting parties; of the former territories of the original contracting parties which, after attaining independence or commercial autonomy, acceded to the General Agreement under Article XXVI:5(c); and of Chile.

When the modalities of accession to the General Agreement were considered for the first time at the Third Session in Annecy in 1949, the Working Party on this subject decided that in the Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession, the “date of this Agreement” for the purposes of Article II would be changed “with the object of placing acceding governments in a comparable position to that in which the present contracting parties were at Geneva ...”.¹ The Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession in October 1949 therefore provided that “In each case in which Article II of the General Agreement refers to the date of that Agreement, the applicable date in respect of the Schedules annexed to this Protocol shall be the date of this Protocol”.² This approach has guided subsequent protocols of accession and tariff protocols; see the discussion of “date of this Agreement” under Article II.

For the purposes of Articles V:6, VII:4(d) and X:3(c), the Working Party at Annecy decided to substitute the date of the Havana Final Act, 24 March 1948, and this approach was followed for the next group of accessions in the Torquay Protocol of 1951.³ Since the next accession thereafter, which was the accession of Japan in 1955, the standard terms in accession protocols have provided that the “date of this Agreement” for the purposes of these articles shall be the date of the protocol of accession or (where the acceding government had previously acceded provisionally) the date of the declaration on provisional accession.⁴

Hence, the “date of this Agreement” is different for different contracting parties; in the case of concessions under Article II, the “date of this Agreement” may be different for different tariff concessions of the same contracting party. See also the material on “date of this Agreement” under Articles II, V, VII and X.

(1) “open for acceptance”

Article XXVI provides for definitive acceptance of the General Agreement by those contracting parties specified in Article XXVI:2. All others must accede under Article XXXIII. Protocols of accession provide that the acceding government, having become a contracting party by agreeing to apply provisionally the General Agreement, will have the right to accede definitively to the General Agreement on the terms specified in the accession protocol; see also below at page 916. This formulation dates from the Third Session, held at Annecy in 1949, which first considered the modalities of accession to the General Agreement. The Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession has served as the model for all subsequent accession protocols. The 1949 Report on “Accession at Annecy” notes that “Upon the entry into force of the General Agreement, under Article XXVI, an acceding government will be entitled to accede definitively to the Agreement in much the same way as a present contracting party can accept it definitively under that article”.⁵ Concerning the Annecy Protocol, the Working Party Report notes:

“Paragraph 8(a) of the protocol provides for accession to the Agreement when it enters into force pursuant to Article XXVI or thereafter. By the deposit of an instrument of accession, the acceding governments may accede, upon the terms of the protocol, to the Agreement in the form in which it enters into force pursuant to Article XXVI. This may or may not be identical with that provisionally applied by acceding governments ...

“The procedure for such definitive accession is similar to the procedure contained in Article XXVI ... it envisages that the deposit of an instrument of accession may take place either prior to or following the entry into force of the Agreement, but that such accession would not take effect until the definitive entry into force of the Agreement.”⁶

The General Agreement has been accepted definitively only by Liberia and Haiti, and Liberia subsequently withdrew. Instead, the General Agreement is applied provisionally by contracting parties under the Protocol of Provisional Application or subsequent Protocols of Accession to the General Agreement; see the chapter of this Index on provisional application.

(2) Reservations on acceptance

During the negotiation of the General Agreement in the Tariff Agreement Committee at Geneva in 1947, the initial proposal, to have a protocol of signature of the General Agreement, was deleted in favour of adoption of the Protocol of Provisional Application combined with changes in the text of the General Agreement. It was stated in this connection that:

“... there being no provision for signature of the Agreement, there is, of course, no occasion for any country to reserve its position upon signature. However, it would still be open for any country to reserve its position upon acceptance of the Agreement. ... In that event, of course, the acceptance, to be valid under international law ... must be then agreed to by the other countries which have then accepted the Agreement...”

“... signature of the Protocol of Provisional Application ... commits the signatory Government, and it is on a par with the acceptance of the Trade Agreement. Therefore, any reservations to the signature of the Protocol of Provisional Application must be accepted and agreed to by all other countries signing the Protocol of Provisional Application. ... I should not think it would be necessary for any country to reserve its position with respect to the signature of the Protocol because, after all, it is a protocol of provisional application. Part I of the Agreement, that is the tariff part, is to be applied provisionally, and Part II, that is the general provisions, with respect to which I think most of the reservations apply, is to be applied to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation.”⁷

See also Article XXXIII (concerning reservations to accession protocols) and Article XXX (concerning reservations to protocols of amendment).

(3) Reservation on acceptance accepted 7 March 1955

During the Review Session of 1954-55, discussions took place regarding the possibility of definitive application of the General Agreement within an institutional framework including the establishment of an Organization for Trade Cooperation. In response to concerns expressed by certain contracting parties regarding existing legislation, the Working Party on Organizational and Functional Questions recommended “that it should be open to contracting parties to accept the definitive application of the Agreement under the provisions of Article XXVI subject to a reservation in respect of existing legislation similar to that covering such legislation in the Protocol of Provisional Application and other Protocols. Such a reservation would have to be accepted by all the contracting parties. Accordingly the Working Party proposed that the contracting parties should, at this Session, agree unanimously that acceptance subject to such a reservation will be valid”.⁸ The “Resolution of 7 March Expressing the Unanimous Agreement of the Contracting Parties to the Attaching of a Reservation on Acceptance Pursuant to Article XXVI”⁹ provides that “The contracting parties unanimously agree

“1. that an acceptance pursuant to Article XXVI shall be valid even if accompanied by a reservation to the effect that Part II of the General Agreement will be applied to the fullest extent not inconsistent with legislation which existed on 30 October 1947 or, in the case of a contracting party which since 30 June 1949 has acceded to the Agreement, the date of the Protocol providing for such accession,

“2. that any contracting party attaching such a reservation shall submit as soon as possible after its acceptance of the General Agreement pursuant to Article XXVI a list of the principal legislative provisions covered by such reservation,

“3. that the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall review annually progress made in bringing such legislation into conformity with the General Agreement,

“4. that three years from the entry into force of the General Agreement under Article XXVI the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall review the situation then prevailing with respect to such reservations with a view to assessing the progress achieved towards the full application of the General Agreement by all contracting parties and to make appropriate recommendations”.

⁹3S/48.

The following interpretations of this Resolution are provided in the Report of the Working Party on “Organizational and Functional Questions”¹⁰ and in summary records from the Review Session.

- The phraseology used in the Resolution is the same as that employed in the Protocol of Provisional Application and is subject to the same interpretation regarding the mandatory character of the legislation.¹¹
- “... the reservation would provide to a contracting party a defence against the charge that it was acting inconsistently with the General Agreement only to the extent to which the legislation in question was in fact covered by the terms of the reservation. It was open to any contracting party to submit this matter to the judgment of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under the appropriate procedures of the Agreement or in the course of the review provided for in the [Resolution].”¹²
- “The formula suggested ... does not set any fixed time-limit for the duration of a reservation, but the general intent of the [Resolution] and the detailed procedures proposed are directed towards securing as early as possible complete conformity between the legislation of contracting parties and their obligations under the General Agreement ...”¹³
- “It was the understanding of the Working Party that the annual review provided for in paragraph 3 ... would afford an opportunity for consultations regarding any special difficulties of any contracting party arising out of the operation of the legislation of another contracting party covered by the Reservation. The words ‘appropriate recommendations’ in paragraph 4 were intended to mean that the CONTRACTING PARTIES could make whatever recommendations were indicated in the circumstances existing at the time, taking into account any inequities which would result from the maintenance of the situation. It was also clear that the acceptance of the Resolution would not deprive any contracting party of resort to Article XXIII in accordance with paragraph 1(b) or (c) thereof.”¹⁴

The CONTRACTING PARTIES agreed that the following interpretation proposed by New Zealand was correct:

- “(i) that the purpose of the reservation procedures was to give contracting parties with legislation inconsistent with the Agreement a breathing space within which to bring that legislation into conformity with the Agreement without the need for recourse to transitional period procedures;
- “(ii) that the provision in paragraph 3 would permit the CONTRACTING PARTIES annually to review the progress made in bringing such legislation into conformity with the Agreement, with a view to assessing the progress achieved towards the full application of the Agreement by all contracting parties, and to making appropriate recommendations.
- “(iii) that, in the review mentioned in paragraph 4 of the situation prevailing at the end of three years with respect to the Resolution, the CONTRACTING PARTIES would then decide what further recommendations – over and above those which might have been made following annual reviews – would be appropriate to ensure the equal acceptance by all contracting parties of the obligations of the General Agreement.”¹⁵

(1) Authentic text

The standard text of accession protocols provides that

“The provisions of the General Agreement to be applied to contracting parties by [...] shall, except as otherwise provided in this Protocol, be the provisions contained in the text annexed to the Final Act of the second session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, as rectified, amended and otherwise modified by such instruments as may have become effective on the day on which [...] becomes a contracting party.”¹⁶

(1) Authentic texts: languages

Text of the General Agreement: Under Article XXVI, the texts of Parts I through III of the General Agreement and the annexes thereto are authentic both in English and in French. When Part IV of the General Agreement was drawn up, the Protocol Amending the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to Introduce a New Part IV on Trade and Development provided for authentic texts in English, French and Spanish.¹⁷ The Secretariat prepared and published on its own responsibility a Spanish translation of the text of the General Agreement in Volume IV of the Basic Instruments and Selected Documents series, but as no authentic Spanish text was ever agreed for Parts I through III of the General Agreement, Parts I-III of this text had no formal status. A Spanish language text of the Havana Charter had been finalized in October 1949 and deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations as one of the authentic texts of the Charter.¹⁸

During the legal drafting process for the Uruguay Round, participants working on the French and Spanish texts of the Final Act noted a lack of concordance between the French and Spanish versions of the Uruguay Round texts and the French and Spanish texts respectively of the General Agreement. They also noted a number of instances of a lack of concordance between the English, French and Spanish texts of the General Agreement. Upon discussion participants concluded that the preferable course would be to conform the French and Spanish texts of the General Agreement to the linguistic usage reflected in the English language text and the Uruguay Round Agreements. In addition, Spanish-speaking delegations sought to establish an authentic text of Parts I-III of the General Agreement in Spanish. Participants decided to implement these objectives directly in the text of the General Agreement that would be incorporated into Annex 1A of the WTO Agreement, with certain other legal instruments, as the “General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994” (or “GATT 1994”). With the agreement of participants, lists of agreed rectifications to the authentic French text, and of corrections to Parts I-III of the Spanish text published as Volume IV of the BISD, were drawn up by the Translation and Documentation Division of the Secretariat and were circulated as annexes to document MTN.TNC/41, a Decision of the Trade Negotiations Committee (TNC) on “Corrections to be Introduced in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade”. In this Decision, the TNC:

“Noting the need to ensure improved concordance between the French-language text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 and other texts in the Final Act, and the desirability of introducing corresponding corrections in the French-language text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1947;

“Noting further that the text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 will be authentic in the Spanish language for all Parts of that agreement; and that it is desirable to make a corresponding Spanish language text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1947 authentic in all parts;

¹⁶See, e.g., Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession, I/79, 81, para. 6; Protocol for the Accession of Costa Rica, L/6626, 37S/7.

¹⁸The Spanish translation was prepared by the government of Cuba, was redrafted by a committee of interested governments in September 1948, and was further redrafted on the basis of comments and finalized in a drafting committee which met in September-October 1949. See further ICITO/1/21 and ICITO/1/25. Chinese and Russian translations of the Charter, prepared by the United Nations translation services, were not finalized; copies are on deposit in the GATT Library.

“Decides to invite the CONTRACTING PARTIES:

- “(a) to initiate as soon as possible the procedures required for the correction of the French-language text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1947 in accordance with the list in Annex A to this Decision;
- “(b) to correct the Spanish-language text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in Volume IV of the Basic Instruments and Selected Documents in accordance with the list in Annex B to this Decision; and
- “(c) to initiate as soon as possible the procedures required for the authentication of a Spanish-language text of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1947 as so corrected.”¹⁹

The TNC adopted this Decision on 30 March 1994 when it approved the Final Act of the Uruguay Round. The text that defines GATT 1994, which appears in Annex 1A of the WTO Agreement and was approved on the same day, included a Paragraph 2(c) as follows:

- “(i) The text of GATT 1994 shall be authentic in English, French and Spanish.
- “(ii) The text of GATT 1994 in the French language shall be subject to the rectifications of terms indicated in Annex A to document MTN.TNC/41.
- “(iii) The authentic text of GATT 1994 in the Spanish language shall be the text in Volume IV of the Basic Instruments and Selected Documents series, subject to the rectifications of terms indicated in Annex B to document MTN.TNC/41.”²⁰

The corrected and authentic French and Spanish texts of the GATT 1994, including the rectifications in MTN.TNC/41, appear in The Results of the Uruguay Round of Trade Negotiations: The Legal Texts, published by the Secretariat.

On 10 May 1994, after the 15 April 1994 signing of the Final Act at Marrakesh, the GATT Council adopted a decision which included operative clauses identical to those of the decision in document MTN.TNC/41, as well as the same lists of rectifications and corrections as in that document.²¹ The Secretary-General of the United Nations, who is the depositary of Parts I-III of the GATT 1947, is responsible for conducting rectification of texts and authentication of new language texts. However, as of early 1995 the process of rectification of the French text and authentication of a corrected Spanish text of the GATT 1947 had not been initiated. In consequence, there remained differences between the French language text of the GATT 1947 and the French language text included in the GATT 1994, and between the Spanish language text hitherto published in Volume IV of the BISD and the Spanish language text included in the GATT 1994.

Authentic text of Schedules: During discussions on the draft General Agreement at Geneva in 1947 it was agreed that “each Schedule would be authentic in either English or French or in both languages, at the option of the country whose Schedule was concerned. The way it was decided to provide for this was to put in parentheses at the top of the Schedule the words: ‘Authentic in the English text only’ or ‘Authentic in the French text only,’ if it was to be authentic only in one of these two languages. For that reason it was not considered necessary” to refer to the authentic language of Schedules in Article II or in the paragraph corresponding to the present Article XXVI:3.²² The standard text of accession protocols now provides that the English, French and Spanish texts of the protocol will each be authentic, “except as otherwise specified with respect to the Schedule annexed thereto”.²³ Tariff protocols such as the Geneva (1992) Protocol provide that “The Schedules annexed hereto are authentic in the English, French or Spanish language as specified in each Schedule”.²⁴ No Schedule done in a language other than English, French or Spanish has ever been made authentic.

Practice since 1979: With two exceptions the Tokyo Round Agreements of 1979 were done in English, French and Spanish, each text being equally authentic. The Agreement on Trade in Civil Aircraft was initially done in English and French; a Spanish text was added in 1986. Also, the 1979 Agreement on Government Procurement provided that the lists of entities attached thereto would be authentic in English, French or Spanish as specified.²⁵ Since 1984, authentic texts of agreements and protocols under the auspices of the GATT have been done in three languages, English, French and Spanish. The text of the WTO Agreement and of the agreements in Annexes I through 4 thereof are authentic in English, French and Spanish. In conformity with earlier practice the Marrakesh Protocol to the GATT 1994 provides in paragraph 8 that “The Schedules annexed hereto are authentic in the English, French or Spanish language as specified in each Schedule”. Also, commitments on market access annexed to the General Agreement on Trade in Services, and the Appendices listing entity coverage of the 1994 Agreement on Government Procurement are authentic as specified in English, French or Spanish.

For examples of interpretation of the meaning of a provision in the light of the different authentic texts thereof, see, e.g., the Panel Report on “Italian Discrimination against Imported Agricultural Machinery”,²⁶ the Report of the Group of Experts on Anti-dumping and Countervailing Duties²⁷, a Note by the Executive Secretary on “Article XXIV:5(a) – Interpretation of the word ‘applicable’”,²⁸ the Working Party Report on “EEC – Association with Malta”²⁹, and the Panel Report on “United States – Procurement of a Sonar Mapping System”.³⁰ There have in addition been discussions of the differences between authentic texts of the General Agreement or associated legal instruments.³¹

(3) Working languages of the GATT

The negotiation of the Havana Charter and the General Agreement was conducted in English and French, and since that time these two languages have been working languages of ICITO and the GATT. Rule 33 of the Rules of Procedure of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provides that “Subject to the provisions of Rule 34, English and French shall be the working languages”. Rule 34 provides that “A decision, by unanimous agreement, may be taken at any meeting to adopt a rule of procedure regarding interpretations of a more simple character than rule 33”.³² Since the beginning of the GATT, all GATT documents have been issued in both English and French and interpretation from and into English and French has been provided for all formal meetings.

At the Seventeenth Session in November 1960, the representative of Uruguay on behalf of the Spanish-speaking contracting parties urged that the Spanish language be introduced on a progressive basis. On the basis of a study by the Budget Working Party it was agreed to introduce for the year 1961 simultaneous interpretation from Spanish into English and French during plenary meetings of the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the Council, and translation of some texts from Spanish into English and French.³³ At the Nineteenth Session in November 1961, the CONTRACTING PARTIES approved the introduction of simultaneous interpretation at all meetings of committees and working groups from and into English and French and from Spanish into English and French.³⁴ During the period 1962-1979 the use of Spanish was gradually expanded as the budget permitted. As of 1979, interpretation into Spanish was provided at meetings of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Council and the Committee on Trade and Development and for other meetings where many Spanish language experts were present. Publications of the GATT, as well as documents containing decisions, legal texts and reports of committees, working parties or panels, were also issued in Spanish. During the Tokyo Round, most of the Tokyo Round technical documents were also issued in Spanish, and interpretation from and into Spanish was also provided for formal MTN meetings.

After the close of the Tokyo Round negotiations in 1979, the budget estimates for 1980 were established “so as to continue to provide the same services for the implementation of the results of the negotiations, as well as for the other operational activities of the GATT”.³⁵ This practice has been continued to the present. Since 1983, all GATT documents have been distributed in English, French and Spanish. All Uruguay Round documents have been issued in English, French and Spanish and interpretation from and into all three languages has been provided for all formal meetings of Uruguay Round negotiating groups.

(4) Deposit

All GATT legal instruments from 1948 until 1 February 1955, including Parts I-III of the General Agreement and the Protocol of Provisional Application, were deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who continues to handle depositary functions for them. For all later instruments, including the Part IV Protocol and the Tokyo Round Agreements, depositary functions have been entrusted to the Executive Secretary (later, the Director-General) to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The Secretariat has registered these agreements, has taken care of formalities regarding accession and participation, and has prepared the loose-leaf Status of Legal Instruments published by the GATT. All GATT legal instruments have been published in the United Nations Treaty Series.

On 8 and 9 December, the Preparatory Committee for the WTO, the GATT CONTRACTING PARTIES and the Executive Committee of the Interim Commission of the International Trade Organization (ICITO) adopted an Agreement on the Transfer of Assets, Liabilities, Records, Staff and Functions from the Interim Commission of the International Trade Organization and the GATT to the World Trade Organization. Paragraph 5 of this agreement provides that “The Director-General of the WTO shall perform the depositary functions of the Director-General of the GATT 1947 after the date on which the legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are terminated. On that date the records of the GATT 1947 shall be transferred to the WTO.”³⁶

4. Paragraph 4: acceptance of the General Agreement

Paragraph 4 provides for deposit of instruments of acceptance of the General Agreement. When the modalities of accession to the GATT were first considered in 1949, standard terms were drafted for the Annex Protocol of Terms of Accession, so that this instrument would provide not only for provisional application of the General Agreement by the acceding government, but would also confer on that government a right to accede to the General Agreement under Article XXVI. The 1949 Report of the Working Party on “Accession at Annecy” notes that

“By the deposit of an instrument of accession, the acceding governments may accede, on the terms of the protocol, to the Agreement in the form in which it enters into force pursuant to Article XXVI. This may or may not be identical with that provisionally applied by the government under paragraph 1 of the Protocol.

“The procedure for such definitive accession is similar to the procedure for acceptance contained in Article XXVI ... It envisages that the deposit of an instrument of accession may take place either prior to or following the definitive entry into force of the Agreement, but that such accession would not take effect until the definitive entry into force of the Agreement.”³⁷

See, for instance, paragraph 8 of the Annecy Protocol, which provides:

“(a) Any acceding government ... may, on or after the date on which the General Agreement enters into force pursuant to Article XXVI thereof, accede to that Agreement upon the terms of this Protocol by deposit of an instrument of accession with the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Such accession shall take effect on the day on which the General Agreement enters into force pursuant to Article XXVI or on the thirtieth day following the day of the deposit of the instrument of accession, whichever shall be the later.

“(b) Accession to the General Agreement pursuant to [sub-paragraph (a)] shall, for the purpose of paragraph 2 of Article XXXII of that Agreement, be regarded as acceptance of the Agreement pursuant to paragraph [4] of Article XXVI thereof.”³⁸

(1) “Territories for which it has international responsibility”

(a) Territorial scope of acceptance

Paragraph 1 of the Protocol of Provisional Application provides that, in respect of Belgium, France, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom, acceptance is limited to their metropolitan territories. Acceptance by the other governments listed in paragraph 1 (Australia, Canada, Luxembourg, and the United States) is not subject to that express limitation. Paragraph 2 provides that the governments named in paragraph 1 shall make effective provisional application of the General Agreement in respect of any of their other territories other than their metropolitan territories after giving notice thereof to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.³⁹ Notices under paragraph 2 were received from Australia (on behalf of Papua New Guinea), Belgium (on behalf of the Belgian Congo), France (on behalf of all overseas territories of the French Union listed in Annex B except Morocco), the Netherlands (on behalf of its overseas territories), and the United Kingdom (on behalf of Newfoundland, the Mandated Territory of Palestine, all territories for the international relations of which it is responsible except Jamaica, and later on behalf of Jamaica).⁴⁰

See also statements concerning territorial application and/or territorial scope of acceptance in accession protocols e.g. of Japan⁴¹, Portugal⁴² and Spain.⁴³

In a number of instances, governments have invoked or disinvoked Article XXXV in respect of territories for which they had international responsibility at the time and in respect of which they had agreed to apply provisionally the General Agreement under paragraph 2 of the Protocol of Provisional Application.⁴⁴

These territorial units into which the National Territory is divided are considered customs territories for the sole purpose of the General Agreement).

⁴⁴See, e.g., L/3396 (disinvocation of Article XXXV by the United Kingdom in respect of certain territories for which it had international responsibility).

The final provisions of the Tokyo Round multilateral trade agreements provide that “In regard to acceptance, the provisions of Article XXVI:5(a) and (b) of the General Agreement would be applicable.”⁴⁵ On 17 December 1979 the United Kingdom accepted six of these agreements on behalf of the territories for which it has international responsibility except for Antigua, Bermuda, Brunei, Cayman Islands, Montserrat, St. Kitts-Nevis, Sovereign Base Areas Cyprus and the British Virgin Islands.⁴⁶ On 23 April 1986 Hong Kong was deemed to be a contracting party to the GATT in accordance with Article XXVI:5(c) (see below); having declared its intention to continue to accept each of these agreements, Hong Kong became a party to each of them in its own right with effect from 23 April 1986.⁴⁷ The Netherlands accepted the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade and the Agreement on Civil Aircraft “in respect of the Kingdom as a whole including the Netherlands Antilles”.⁴⁸ In August 1994 the Committee on Government Procurement approved accession by the Netherlands to the Agreement on Government Procurement with respect to Aruba.⁴⁹

In October 1990, Germany informed contracting parties of the Treaty of German Unity signed 3 October 1990, through which the German Democratic Republic acceded to the Federal Republic of Germany, forming one State which as a single contracting party remained bound by the provisions of the General Agreement.⁵⁰

Paragraph 3 of the accession protocol of Switzerland provides: “For the purposes of the territorial application of this Protocol, the customs territory of Switzerland shall be deemed to include the territory of the Principality of Liechtenstein as long as a customs union treaty with Switzerland is in force.”⁵¹ On 29 March 1994, the Swiss authorities informed the Secretariat that while Switzerland had accepted its accession protocol on behalf of the territory of Liechtenstein, the Principality of Liechtenstein possesses full autonomy with respect to its external commercial relations and the other matters provided for in the General Agreement; as Liechtenstein also made a request under Article XXVI:5(c) on the same date, Liechtenstein was deemed to be a contracting party as of 29 March 1994, and succeeded to the Schedule concessions of Switzerland.

See also the material on paragraph 2 of the Protocol of Provisional Application in this Index.

b) Changes in international responsibility

In 1947, the Government of the United Kingdom negotiated on behalf of Newfoundland, as a separate customs territory for which the United Kingdom had international responsibility; the concessions accorded thereby constituted Section B of Schedule XIX. When Newfoundland became a part of the customs territory of Canada, in 1949, the CONTRACTING PARTIES approved a Declaration of 11 August 1949, providing that “Section B shall be deemed to be no longer a part of Schedule XIX”.⁵² Newfoundland has since that date been subject to the obligations of Canada under the General Agreement.

(c) Territorial claims

At the Nineteenth Session in 1961, in connection with consideration of the draft protocol for the accession of Portugal, the representative of India sought clarification of the relationship between Portugal and certain customs territories referred to therein as overseas provinces of Portugal. “The Executive Secretary stated that he was satisfied that in adopting the text which was proposed for paragraph 3, the CONTRACTING PARTIES would not be taking any position with respect to the international status of these territories. concerned only with what was relevant to the General Agreement, which were the trading arrangements proposed with respect to these territories and not their status in international law. Therefore, the approval of this protocol would not, in his view, in any way affect or conflict with whatever decisions might be taken or had been taken by the General Assembly of the United Nations, on these legal matters. The Chairman stated that in his view no conflict arose between the terms of the protocol and the United Nations resolution.”⁵³

In 1965, in response to the issuance of a list of countries and territories where the General Agreement was effective, the US took the formal position that “it does not recognize any of the claims of sovereignty which have been asserted over territory in Antarctica nor does it recognize any basis for any country to apply such an agreement as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to that area. Moreover, the Government of the United States of America reserves all the rights of the United States of America with respect to Antarctica. It calls attention, in that connexion, to Article IV of the Antarctic Treaty, signed at Washington on 1 December 1959.”⁵⁴

d) Application of Article XXVI:5(b)

The 1971 Panel Report on “Jamaica – Margins of Preference” notes that in 1948, the government of the United Kingdom gave notice (under paragraph 2 of the Protocol of Provisional Application) of its intention to apply the General Agreement provisionally to all of the territories for the international relations of which it was responsible, except for Jamaica. In 1962, United Kingdom, in a communication received on 2 July, gave notice that the General Agreement was to be applied provisionally also to Jamaica. In accordance with paragraph 2 of the Protocol of Provisional Application and Article XXVI:5(b), this notification was effective as from 1 August 1962.⁵⁵

(e) Occupied areas

Until the Review Session amendments agreed in 1954-55, an interpretative note to Article XXVI provided that “Territories for which the contracting parties have international responsibility do not include areas under military occupation”. A Final Note provided that “The applicability of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to the trade of contracting parties with the areas under military occupation has not been dealt with and is reserved for further study at an early date. Meanwhile, nothing in this Agreement shall be taken to prejudice the issues involved. This, of course, does not affect the applicability of the provisions of Articles XXII and XXIII to matters arising from such trade”.⁵⁶ These provisions were deleted effective 7 October 1957; see section III below.

(2) Succession to GATT under Article XXVI:5(c)

Of the 128 GATT contracting parties as of 1 January 1995, 63 have succeeded to contracting party status on the basis of Article XXVI:5(c). A list of these contracting parties appears in the appendix tables at the end of this book.

(a) “full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in this Agreement”

The preparatory work of the General Agreement indicates that it was intended that the “responsible contracting party” should certify that the customs territory in question “had the right de jure and/or de facto to act on its own behalf and to fulfil” its obligations.⁵⁷ During the negotiation of the General Agreement in 1947, an ad-hoc Sub-committee examined the situation of Burma, Ceylon and Southern Rhodesia (now Myanmar, Sri Lanka and Zimbabwe). In response to a request by the Sub-committee, the United Kingdom submitted information on certain specific matters relating to the autonomy in commercial policy of these territories and made a Declaration to the Tariff Agreement Committee establishing the ability of these three territories to enter into and fulfil all obligations under the General Agreement. The Sub-Committee agreed to recommend that Burma, Ceylon and Southern Rhodesia be admitted to participate as full contracting parties, and also recommended consequential changes to the Preamble, the provisions on acceptance which became Article XXVI:5, and the accession provisions in Article XXXIII.⁵⁸

Declarations concerning the autonomy in commercial matters of customs territories under the international responsibility of another State were made in the case of Hong Kong, Lesotho, Liechtenstein and Macau.⁵⁹

(b) “upon sponsorship through a declaration by the responsible contracting party”

The Sub-committee which drafted this provision during the negotiation of the General Agreement in Geneva in 1947 “thought this was necessary ... because the other contracting parties must have sufficient information to be able to judge the legal ability of such separate customs territory”.⁶⁰

Before 1963, it was customary to refer requests under Article XXVI:5(c) to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, even though accession under Article XXVI:5(c) is automatic providing that the stated conditions are fulfilled. At its meeting of April/May 1963, the Council agreed to a Secretariat proposal for a simplified procedure for the admission of newly-independent States. The minutes of that meeting note that “Article XXVI:5(c) provided that if certain conditions were fulfilled, the admission of such States would follow automatically, and it was therefore considered that if requests were received at a time when no session was to be held it would be unfortunate if mere formalities were to cause delay in the admission of the new contracting parties. It was now proposed that when a request for admission under Article XXVI:5(c) was received the matter could be dealt with by a certification by the Executive Secretary to the effect that the conditions of Article XXVI:5(c) had been fulfilled in respect of a certain State, and advising that the State had therefore become a contracting party and had acquired the rights and obligations of the General Agreement. These certifications would be brought to the notice of the Council or the CONTRACTING PARTIES when next in session so that note could be taken of them and a welcome extended to the new contracting parties.”⁶¹

This procedure of certification has been followed since 1963. The rights and obligations of contracting parties succeeding to contracting party status under Article XXVI:5(c) date from the date of independence of the newly-independent State or the date of receipt of certification of a territory’s autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations.

In instances where pre-existing concessions in schedules related to the territory of the newly-independent State or newly-autonomous territory, such concessions have been continued, and a new Schedule for the new contracting party comprising those concessions has been established by using the procedure of certification of changes to schedules to the General Agreement. Paragraph 5 of the Decision of 26 March 1980 on “Procedures for Modification and Rectification of Schedules of Tariff Concessions” states that “The procedure of Certification under this Decision may be applied for the establishment of consolidated Schedules or of new Schedules under paragraph 5(c) of Article XXVI, wherein all changes are modifications or rectifications [of a purely formal character]”.⁶²

(c) “be deemed to be a contracting party”

In the first full draft of the General Agreement (EPCT/135) the separate customs territory was “entitled to appoint a representative” to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. In the revised text of 30 October 1947, the word “deemed” was used intentionally in order to make clear that such territory could either act in its own right as a full contracting party and be represented by a separate delegate (as in the case of Burma, Ceylon and Southern Rhodesia during the negotiation of the General Agreement in 1947) or continue to be represented by the metropolitan contracting party acting on behalf of such customs territory.⁶³

(d) Terms and conditions of succession to GATT

The Report of the Working Party on “Article XXXV - Application to Japan” pointed out “that there could be no doubt that a government becoming a contracting party under Article XXVI:5(c) does so on the terms and conditions previously accepted by the metropolitan government on behalf of the territory in question. Consequently, if Article XXXV had been invoked in respect of that territory (or if that territory had not been specifically excluded from such invocation), it would continue to be valid unless expressly disinvoked by the succeeding government. If this were clearly understood, it would then be unnecessary for the new government to take an immediate decision on whether the invocation should or should not be maintained”.⁶⁴

The 1971 Panel Report on “Jamaica – Margins of Preference” includes the following finding:

“The Panel held that since Jamaica had acceded to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade under the provisions of Article XXVI:5(c) it had acquired the rights and obligations which had previously been accepted by the United Kingdom in respect of the territory of Jamaica. This meant that Jamaica assumed the rights and obligations involved in the application to it of the General Agreement by the United Kingdom before Jamaica became independent. On 6 August 1962, the day Jamaica became independent, Article I:4 formed part of the General Agreement as it had been applied by the United Kingdom on behalf of the territory of Jamaica. The provision of Article I:4 establishing 10 April 1947 as the base date for permissible margins of preference was therefore applicable to Jamaica.”⁶⁵

(3) De facto application of the GATT by newly-independent States pending a decision under paragraph 5(c)

The concept of de facto application of the General Agreement arose as a means to provide some time for governments of newly-independent territories to consider their future commercial policy and the question of their relations with the General Agreement, while continuing the pre-existing arrangements governing the trade relations between the newly-independent country and the contracting parties to the GATT. The Recommendation of 1 November 1957 on “Procedures for Sponsorship under Article XXVI:5(c)”⁶⁶ provided that as soon as a customs territory in respect of which a contracting party had accepted the Agreement, or had made effective the provisional application of the Agreement, acquired full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in the Agreement, the responsible contracting party should notify the Secretariat. The CONTRACTING PARTIES would then set a “reasonable period” during which the contracting parties would continue to apply de facto the General Agreement in their relations with that territory on a basis of reciprocity, pending accession under Article XXVI:5(c).⁶⁷ A Recommendation of 18 November 1960 set the period of de facto application at two years from the acquisition of autonomy.⁶⁸ Later Recommendations provided for prolongation of the period of de facto application for such territories.⁶⁹

⁶⁸Recommendation of 18 November 1960 on “Application of the General Agreement to Territories which Acquire Autonomy in

Considering that prolongations of the de facto régime had frequently been requested and that they had always been granted, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted the Recommendation adopted 11 November 1967 on "Application of the General Agreement to Territories which acquire Autonomy in Commercial Matters", in which the CONTRACTING PARTIES, inter alia,

"Considering that paragraph 5(c) of Article XXVI of the General Agreement provides that if a customs territory, in respect of which a contracting party has accepted the Agreement, 'acquires full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in the Agreement', such territory may be 'deemed' to be a contracting party;

"Considering that the CONTRACTING PARTIES have recognized that the governments of territories which acquire such autonomy will normally require some time to consider their future commercial policy and the question of their relations with the General Agreement and that it is desirable that meanwhile the provisions of the Agreement should continue to be applied between such territories and the contracting parties, and accordingly, recommended, on 8 November 1960, that contracting parties should continue to apply de facto for a period of two years, the General Agreement in their relations with any such territory, provided that the territory continued to apply de facto the Agreement to its trade with contracting parties; and

"Considering that many such territories have requested repeated prolongations of this arrangement for the de facto application of the Agreement to their trade and that the CONTRACTING PARTIES have granted all such requests;

"Recommend that contracting parties should continue to apply de facto the General Agreement in their relations with each territory which acquires full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and in respect of which a contracting party had accepted the Agreement, provided such territory continues to apply de facto the Agreement to its trade with the contracting parties."⁷⁰

The Recommendation of 1967 does not have a time-limit. The Director-General is requested to submit a report on its application after three years. The most recent such report was submitted in June 1991⁷¹. A list of countries with respect to which the Recommendation was applicable as of April 1993 appears in the Appendices to this Index.

Letters have been addressed to the governments concerned, upon their independence, advising them that the Recommendation is applicable to their trade relations with the contracting parties and seeking their confirmation that they will reciprocate in applying the General Agreement on a de facto basis. The governments are regularly kept informed about GATT activities and receive all GATT documents and publications. They are also invited to be represented by observers at the annual sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have never defined the meaning of de facto application. However, the following practices have evolved in regard to this form of association with the General Agreement⁷²:

- The countries applying the General Agreement on a de facto basis are expected to observe the substantive provisions of the General Agreement. However, they do not apply the procedural provisions of the General Agreement. Thus, when these countries impose import restrictions for balance of payments purposes, they do not notify the GATT and do not consult in the GATT Balance-of-Payments Committee under Article XVIII:B. They also do not notify the trade measures they take for development purposes under Article XVIII:C, emergency actions under Article XIX, or the formation of customs unions and free-trade areas under Article XXIV. They are expected to apply the schedule of concessions which the metropolitan government had agreed to apply to their territory; however, they do not notify any modifications of their tariff schedules under Article XXVIII. The contracting parties granting GATT treatment to a country applying the General Agreement on a de facto basis determine themselves whether the conditions stipulated in these provisions are met.
- Each contracting party decides whether or not to apply the provisions of the General Agreement to a country which applied the General Agreement on a de facto basis. The contracting parties do not inform the GATT of their decision.
- The CONTRACTING PARTIES do not assist in the resolution of disputes on the interpretation or application of the General Agreement that might arise between contracting parties and countries applying the General Agreement on a de facto basis. Article XXIII:2 is not applied to such disputes.⁷³
- The countries applying the General Agreement on a de facto basis are treated as non-contracting parties for organizational purposes. They are invited to be represented as observers at the annual sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. They do not attend other GATT meetings unless they have requested and obtained observer status, and they do not contribute to the GATT budget.

The legal aspects of de facto application of the General Agreement are presented in a Secretariat Note of 28 June 1984 on “De facto Application of the General Agreement”.⁷⁴ A Secretariat Note of 1988 lists the countries that have succeeded to the status of contracting parties under Article XXVI:5(c) after having applied the General Agreement on a de facto basis.⁷⁵

6. Paragraph 6: “this Agreement shall enter into force”

Paragraph 6 provides for entry into force of the General Agreement thirty days after the deposit of instruments of acceptance on behalf of governments among the thirty-four governments listed in Annex H, representing 85 per cent of total external trade, computed in accordance with the percentages in Annex H. The 30 October 1947 text of the General Agreement listed twenty governments in Annex H, with percentages based on an average of 1938 and the latest twelve months for which figures were available; Annex H was revised at the Review Session to reflect changes in GATT membership and to update the trade percentages.⁷⁶

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have considered the question of definitive application of the General Agreement on several occasions, for instance during the Review Session in 1955⁷⁷, during the Twenty-second Session in 1965⁷⁸, in 1977⁷⁹ and in 1990.⁸⁰

Only one of the current contracting parties, Haiti, has accepted the General Agreement (on 7 March 1952). Liberia accepted the General Agreement on 17 May 1950, but withdrew from the General Agreement on 13 June 1953. Hence, the General Agreement has never entered into force pursuant to paragraph 6 and continues to be applied by contracting parties “provisionally” under the 1947 Protocol of Provisional Application and subsequent Protocols of Accession.

The WTO Agreement provides in its Article II:2 that the agreements and associated legal instruments included in Annexes 1A, 2 and 3 are integral parts of that Agreement and binding on all Members. A Member that has accepted or acceded to the WTO Agreement is thus bound definitively by “GATT 1994”, as defined in Annex 1A of the WTO Agreement. On 8 December 1994, at their Sixth Special Session, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Decision on “Transitional Co-existence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement”, which provides inter alia:

“The legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are herewith terminated one year after the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement. In the light of unforeseen circumstances, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may decide to postpone the date of termination by no more than one year.”⁸¹

Unless the requisite number of acceptances have been received by that date, the provisional application of the GATT 1947 will terminate without the General Agreement ever having entered into force.

7. Paragraph 7: Registration

Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations provides as follows.

“1. Every treaty and every international agreement entered into by any Member of the United Nations after the present Charter comes into effect shall as soon as possible be registered by the [United Nations] Secretariat and published by it.

“2. No party to any such treaty or international agreement which has not been registered in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article may invoke that treaty or agreement before any organ of the United Nations.”

The General Agreement was registered with the United Nations on 30 May 1950.⁸² Protocols associated with the General Agreement and agreements and arrangements made under the auspices of the GATT have been registered with the United Nations by the Secretariat and published in the United Nations Treaty Series. Information on their registration and UNTS citations can be found in the GATT publication on Status of Legal Instruments.

participation not by governments but by States. However, the Charter too had provisions on acceptance, entry into force, and registration (Article 103), and deposit, date of the Charter and authentic languages (Article 106).

The 30 October text of the General Agreement included an Interpretative Note Ad Article XXVI, as follows: "Territories for which the contracting parties have international responsibility do not include areas under military occupation". It also included a Final Note on areas under military occupation; see page 919 above. These provisions were deleted in the Review Session of 1954-55.

Amendments agreed in 1949: Paragraph 4 of the Article was amended in 1949 to conform to the treatment of territorial application in the accession protocols agreed at Annecy, which aligned the treatment of territorial application with that in the Protocol of Provisional Application. It was also pointed out that "the present form of Article XXVI might frustrate the entry into force of the Agreement" by enabling a territory which was a separate customs territory and did not possess full autonomy in external commercial relations to withhold its consent and thus delay indefinitely the acceptance of the country which was internationally responsible for it. The new text was modelled on Article 104 of the Havana Charter.⁸³

Amendments agreed in the Review Session: In the Review Session in 1954-1955 additional amendments to Article XXVI were agreed. References to the Final Act of the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment were deleted; this involved the introduction of new paragraphs 1 and 2 and amendments in paragraph 6 (formerly 5). References to deposit of acceptances were amended to substitute the Executive Secretary to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for the Secretary-General of the United Nations. At the same time the interpretative note on areas under military occupation was deleted and Annex H was revised.⁸⁴ These changes were effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, which entered into force on 7 October 1957.

Article XXVII

Withholding or Withdrawal of Concessions

Any contracting party shall at any time be free to withhold or to withdraw in whole or in part any concession, provided for in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement, in respect of which such contracting party determines that it was initially negotiated with a government which has not become, or has ceased to be, a contracting party. A contracting party taking such action shall notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES and, upon request, consult with contracting parties which have a substantial interest in the product concerned.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXVII

1. “or has ceased to be a contracting party”

(1) Succession

A Secretariat Note of 29 April 1949 on “The Position of Palestine in Relation to the Agreement” stated that upon termination of the League of Nations mandate of the United Kingdom with respect to Palestine, the successor state could not be regarded as being bound by obligations under the GATT. “The second question is, what is to be done in the light of this conclusion. In this connection it is relevant to record that the United Kingdom negotiated in Geneva on behalf of the mandated territory and the concessions negotiated on behalf of Palestine are contained in a separate section of Schedule XIX. Moreover, the concessions were applied separately on behalf of Palestine by notice on March 20, 1948 to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in accordance with Paragraph 2 of the Protocol of Provisional Application.” The Note proposed the text of a Declaration based on Article XXVII.¹

The Executive Secretary, discussing this Note, stated that “the Secretariat paper had proceeded upon the assumption that the first question to be determined was whether or not Article XXVII applied. If the decision was affirmative the consequences had two aspects. First, the concessions made on behalf of Palestine by the United Kingdom and included in Section E of Schedule XIX would disappear and it might be desirable to make the appropriate rectification subsequently. That could be done by a protocol of rectification approved by a unanimous vote. Secondly, there was the right of withdrawal of concessions granted by other Contracting Parties on Palestine products. This was clearly dealt with in Article XXVII which expressly provided for consultation with other interested Contracting Parties. ... The United Kingdom had negotiated in Geneva on behalf of the mandatory government of Palestine. On 15 May 1948, the mandatory government had ceased to exist. Therefore, at that date the United Kingdom could no longer be regarded as a contracting party in respect of Palestine. ... It was not correct to say that the United Kingdom was withdrawing concessions. The mandatory government having ceased to exist the United Kingdom had ceased to be a contracting party on behalf of Palestine".²

The Declaration adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 9 May 1949 provides:

"Whereas the Government of the United Kingdom in the course of the negotiations leading up to the drawing up of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in 1947, negotiated on behalf of the mandated territory of Palestine for concessions to be accorded to products originating in such territory and for concessions to be accorded to the products of other contracting parties entering such territory, and

"Whereas the Government of the United Kingdom ceased to be responsible for the mandated territory of Palestine on 15 May 1948,

The CONTRACTING PARTIES

Declare that, since the United Kingdom ceased, as from 15 May 1948, to be a contracting party in respect of the territory formerly included in the Palestine mandate,

1. Section E shall be deemed to be no longer part of Schedule XIX; and
2. Any contracting party shall, in accordance with Article XXVII of the General Agreement, be free to withhold or withdraw, in whole or in part, any concession provided for in the appropriate schedule annexed to the GATT which such contracting party determines was initially negotiated with the United Kingdom on behalf of Palestine, provided that the contracting party taking such action shall give notice to all other contracting parties and, upon request, consult with the contracting parties which have a substantial interest in the product concerned."³

It was stated during the discussion of this matter at the Third Session that "It is certain that, during the duration of its mandate, the United Kingdom was competent to contract international obligations on behalf of Palestine. But it is equally certain that termination of its mandate deprived Great Britain of this power and that Great Britain has retained no obligation as a contracting party in respect of the territory of Palestine".⁴

(2) Change in international responsibility for a territory

In 1947 the Government of the United Kingdom negotiated and agreed to tariff concessions on most-favoured-nation and preferential duty rates on behalf of Newfoundland, which applied to the customs territory of Newfoundland. When Newfoundland changed status from an overseas territory of the United Kingdom to a province of Canada, the CONTRACTING PARTIES approved a Declaration of 11 August 1949, which provided that these tariff concessions were no longer part of the tariff schedules and ceased to have effect as from 31 March 1949:

“Whereas the Government of the United Kingdom in the course of the negotiations leading up to the drawing up of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in 1947, negotiated on behalf of Newfoundland, as a separate customs territory for which the United Kingdom had international responsibility; and

“Whereas the concessions to be accorded as a result of such negotiations to the products of other contracting parties entering Newfoundland constituted Section B of Schedule XIX of the General Agreement; and

“Whereas the Government of the United Kingdom ceased to be responsible for Newfoundland on 31 March 1949 and Newfoundland became a part of the customs territory of Canada, which is also a contracting party,

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES declare that Section B shall be deemed to be no longer a part of Schedule XIX.”⁵

2. “that it was initially negotiated”

See infra material on initial negotiating rights (INRs) under Article XXVIII.

3. “a substantial interest in the product concerned”

See infra material on substantial supplier rights under Article XXVIII.

4. Application of Article XXVII in specific cases

Notifications of withdrawal of concessions appear in a table in this chapter. Of the countries listed in the middle column, China, Syria, Lebanon and Liberia subsequently notified their withdrawal of provisional application of the General Agreement. Colombia participated in the Annecy Round but decided against provision being made for its accession in the Annecy Protocol. Korea and Philippines participated in the negotiations at Torquay; schedules of concessions for these countries were included in the Torquay Protocol, but they did not accept the Protocol. Korea acceded in 1967.

5. Article XXVII and tariff protocols

Tariff protocols to which the concessions negotiated in rounds of multilateral trade negotiations have been attached have included provisions permitting participants to withhold or withdraw, in whole or in part, concessions with respect to any product for which the principal supplier is any other participant in the negotiating round or any government having negotiated for accession during the negotiating round, whose schedule has not yet become a Schedule to the General Agreement. Similar provisions also appear in the Marrakesh Protocol to the GATT 1994.⁶

⁵Declaration at II/14; see also GATT/CP/26 (notification by UK), GATT/CP.3/75 (Secretariat note and draft declaration), GATT/CP.3/SR.40 p. 8 (approval). GATT/CP.3/75 notes that this approach was taken after discussion with Canada and with the contracting parties with which the concessions in Schedule XIX were initially negotiated. See also Annecy Press Release No. 60 of 11 August 1949.

6. Modification and rectification of schedules of tariff concessions

In their Decision of 26 March 1980 on “Procedures for Modification and Rectification of Schedules of Tariff Concessions”, the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided, inter alia, that “Changes in the authentic texts of Schedules annexed to the General Agreement which reflect modifications resulting from action under ... Article XXVII ... shall be certified by means of Certifications. A draft of such change shall be communicated to the Director-General within three months after the action has been completed.”⁷

III. PREPARATORY WORK

Article XXVII was drafted as part of the General Agreement in the New York Drafting Committee and at the Geneva meeting of the Preparatory Committee in 1947. It has no direct counterpart in the Havana Charter. During the Review Session of 1954-55, it was agreed to modify the final sentence of Article XXVII in order to require notice to the CONTRACTING PARTIES and consultation upon request with any contracting party claiming a substantial interest in the product concerned.⁸

Modification of Schedules

1. On the first day of each three-year period, the first period beginning on 1 January 1958 (or on the first day of any other period* that may be specified by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by two-thirds of the votes cast) a contracting party (hereafter in this Article referred to as the "applicant contracting party") may, by negotiation and agreement with any contracting party with which such concession was initially negotiated and with any other contracting party determined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to have a principal supplying interest* (which two preceding categories of contracting parties, together with the applicant contracting party, are in this Article hereinafter referred to as the "contracting parties primarily concerned"), and subject to consultation with any other contracting party determined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to have a substantial interest* in such concession, modify or withdraw a concession* included in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement.

2. In such negotiations and agreement, which may include provision for compensatory adjustment with respect to other products, the contracting parties concerned shall endeavour to maintain a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions not less favourable to trade than that provided for in this Agreement prior to such negotiations.

3. (a) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned cannot be reached before 1 January 1958 or before the expiration of a period envisaged in paragraph 1 of this Article, the contracting party which proposes to modify or withdraw the concession shall, nevertheless, be free to do so and if such action is taken any contracting party with which such concession was initially negotiated, any contracting party determined under paragraph 1 to have a principal supplying interest and any contracting party determined under paragraph 1 to have a substantial interest shall then be free not later than six months after such action is taken, to withdraw, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with the applicant contracting party.

(b) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned is reached but any other contracting party determined under paragraph 1 of this Article to have a substantial interest is not satisfied, such other contracting party shall be free, not later than six months after action under such agreement is taken, to withdraw, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with the applicant contracting party.

4. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may, at any time, in special circumstances, authorize* a contracting party to enter into negotiations for modification or withdrawal of a concession included in the appropriate Schedule annexed to this Agreement subject to the following procedures and conditions:

- (a) Such negotiations* and any related consultations shall be conducted in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article.
- (b) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned is reached in the negotiations, the provisions of paragraph 3 (b) of this Article shall apply.

- (c) If agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned is not reached within a period of sixty days* after negotiations have been authorized, or within such longer period as the CONTRACTING PARTIES may have prescribed, the applicant contracting party may refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
- (d) Upon such reference, the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall promptly examine the matter and submit their views to the contracting parties primarily concerned with the aim of achieving a settlement. If a settlement is reached, the provisions of paragraph 3 (b) shall apply as if agreement between the contracting parties primarily concerned had been reached. If no settlement is reached between the contracting parties primarily concerned, the applicant contracting party shall be free to modify or withdraw the concession, unless the CONTRACTING PARTIES determine that the applicant contracting party has unreasonably failed to offer adequate compensation.* If such action is taken, any contracting party with which the concession was initially negotiated, any contracting party determined under paragraph 4 (a) to have a principal supplying interest and any contracting party determined under paragraph 4 (a) to have a substantial interest, shall be free, not later than six months after such action is taken, to modify or withdraw, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with the applicant contracting party.

5. Before 1 January 1958 and before the end of any period envisaged in paragraph 1 a contracting party may elect by notifying the CONTRACTING PARTIES to reserve the right, for the duration of the next period, to modify the appropriate Schedule in accordance with the procedures of paragraph 1 to 3. If a contracting party so elects, other contracting parties shall have the right, during the same period, to modify or withdraw, in accordance with the same procedures, concessions initially negotiated with that contracting party.

Interpretative Note Ad Article XXVIII from Annex I

The CONTRACTING PARTIES and each contracting party concerned should arrange to conduct the negotiations and consultations with the greatest possible secrecy in order to avoid premature disclosure of details of prospective tariff changes. The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall be informed immediately of all changes in national tariffs resulting from recourse to this Article.

1. If the CONTRACTING PARTIES specify a period other than a three-year period, a contracting party may act pursuant to paragraph 1 or paragraph 3 of Article XXVIII on the first day following the expiration of such other period and, unless the CONTRACTING PARTIES have again specified another period, subsequent periods will be three-year periods following the expiration of such specified period.

2. The provision that on 1 January 1958, and on other days determined pursuant to paragraph 1, a contracting party "may ... modify or withdraw a concession" means that on such day, and on the first day after the end of each period, the legal obligation of such contracting party under Article II is altered; it does not mean that the changes in its customs tariff should necessarily be made effective on that day. If a tariff change resulting from negotiations undertaken pursuant to this Article is delayed, the entry into force of any compensatory concessions may be similarly delayed.

3. Not earlier than six months, nor later than three months, prior to 1 January 1958, or to the termination date of any subsequent period, a contracting party wishing to modify or withdraw any concession embodied in the appropriate Schedule, should notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES to this effect. The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall then determine the contracting party or contracting parties with which the negotiations or consultations referred to in paragraph 1 shall take place. Any contracting party so determined shall participate in such negotiations or consultations with the applicant contracting party with the aim of reaching agreement before the end of the period. Any extension of the assured life of the Schedules shall relate to the Schedules as modified after such negotiations, in accordance with paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of Article XXVIII. If the CONTRACTING PARTIES are arranging for multilateral tariff negotiations to take place within the period of six months before 1 January 1958, or before any other day determined pursuant to paragraph 1, they shall include in the arrangements for such negotiations suitable procedures for carrying out the negotiations referred to in this paragraph.

4. The object of providing for the participation in the negotiation of any contracting party with a principal supplying interest, in addition to any contracting party with which the concession was originally negotiated, is to ensure that a contracting party with a larger share in the trade affected by the concession than a contracting party with which the concession was originally negotiated shall have an effective opportunity to protect the contractual right which it enjoys under this Agreement. On the other hand, it is not intended that the scope of the negotiations should be such as to make negotiations and agreement under Article XXVIII unduly difficult nor to create complications in the application of this Article in the future to concessions which result from negotiations thereunder. Accordingly, the CONTRACTING PARTIES should only determine that a contracting party has a principal supplying interest if that contracting party has had, over a reasonable period of time prior to the negotiations, a larger share in the market of the applicant contracting party than a contracting party with which the concession was initially negotiated or would, in the judgment of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, have had such a share in the absence of discriminatory quantitative restrictions maintained by the applicant contracting party. It would therefore not be appropriate for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to determine that more than one contracting party, or in those exceptional cases where there is near equality more than two contracting parties, had a principal supplying interest.

5. Notwithstanding the definition of a principal supplying interest in note 4 to paragraph 1, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may exceptionally determine that a contracting party has a principal supplying interest if the concession in question affects trade which constitutes a major part of the total exports of such contracting party.

6. It is not intended that provision for participation in the negotiations of any contracting party with a principal supplying interest, and for consultation with any contracting party having a substantial interest in the concession which the applicant contracting party is seeking to modify or withdraw, should have the effect that it should have to pay compensation or suffer retaliation greater than the withdrawal or modification sought, judged in the light of the conditions of trade at the time of the proposed withdrawal or modification, making allowance for any discriminatory quantitative restrictions maintained by the applicant contracting party.

7. The expression "substantial interest" is not capable of a precise definition and accordingly may present difficulties for the CONTRACTING PARTIES. It is, however, intended to be construed to cover only those contracting parties which have, or in the absence of discriminatory quantitative restrictions affecting their exports could reasonably be expected to have, a significant share in the market of the contracting party seeking to modify or withdraw the concession.

1. Any request for authorization to enter into negotiations shall be accompanied by all relevant statistical and other data. A decision on such request shall be made within thirty days of its submission.

2. It is recognized that to permit certain contracting parties, depending in large measure on a relatively small number of primary commodities and relying on the tariff as an important aid for furthering diversification of their economies or as an important source of revenue, normally to negotiate for the modification or withdrawal of concessions only under paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII, might cause them at such time to make modifications or withdrawals which in the long run would prove unnecessary. To avoid such a situation the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall authorize any such contracting party, under paragraph 4, to enter into negotiations unless they consider this would result in, or contribute substantially towards, such an increase in tariff levels as to threaten the stability of the Schedules to this Agreement or lead to undue disturbance of international trade.

3. It is expected that negotiations authorized under paragraph 4 for modification or withdrawal of a single item, or a very small group of items, could normally be brought to a conclusion in sixty days. It is recognized, however, that such a period will be inadequate for cases involving negotiations for the modification or withdrawal of a large number of items and in such cases, therefore, it would be appropriate for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to prescribe a longer period.

4. The determination referred to in paragraph 4 (d) shall be made by the CONTRACTING PARTIES within thirty days of the submission of the matter to them unless the applicant contracting party agrees to a longer period.

5. In determining under paragraph 4 (d) whether an applicant contracting party has unreasonably failed to offer adequate compensation, it is understood that the CONTRACTING PARTIES will take due account of the special position of a contracting party which has bound a high proportion of its tariffs at very low rates of duty and to this extent has less scope than other contracting parties to make compensatory adjustment.

UNDERSTANDING ON THE INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE XXVIII OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE 1994

Members hereby agree as follows:

1. For the purposes of modification or withdrawal of a concession, the Member which has the highest ratio of exports affected by the concession (i.e. exports of the product to the market of the Member modifying or withdrawing the concession) to its total exports shall be deemed to have a principal supplying interest if it does not already have an initial negotiating right or a principal supplying interest as provided for in paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII. It is however agreed that this paragraph will be reviewed by the Council for Trade in Goods five years from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement with a view to deciding whether this criterion has worked satisfactorily in securing a redistribution of negotiating rights in favour of small and medium-sized exporting Members. If this is not the case, consideration will be given to possible improvements, including, in the light of the availability of adequate data, the adoption of a criterion based on the ratio of exports affected by the concession to exports to all markets of the product in question.

2. Where a Member considers that it has a principal supplying interest in terms of paragraph 1, it should communicate its claim in writing, with supporting evidence, to the Member proposing to modify or withdraw a concession, and at the same time inform the Secretariat. Paragraph 4 of the "Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII" adopted on 10 November 1980 (BISD 27S/26-28) shall apply in these cases.

3. In the determination of which Members have a principal supplying interest (whether as provided for in paragraph 1 above or in paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII) or substantial interest, only trade in the affected product which has taken place on an MFN basis shall be taken into consideration. However, trade in the affected product which has taken place under non-contractual preferences shall also be taken into account if the trade in question has ceased to benefit from such preferential treatment, thus becoming MFN trade, at the time of the negotiation for the modification or withdrawal of the concession, or will do so by the conclusion of that negotiation.

4. When a tariff concession is modified or withdrawn on a new product (i.e. a product for which three years' trade statistics are not available) the Member possessing initial negotiating rights on the tariff line where the product is or was formerly classified shall be deemed to have an initial negotiating right in the concession in question. The determination of principal supplying and substantial interests and the calculation of compensation shall take into account, inter alia, production capacity and investment in the affected product in the exporting Member and estimates of export growth, as well as forecasts of demand for the product in the importing Member. For the purposes of this paragraph, "new product" is understood to include a tariff item created by means of a breakout from an existing tariff line.

5. Where a Member considers that it has a principal supplying or a substantial interest in terms of paragraph 4, it should communicate its claim in writing, with supporting evidence, to the Member proposing to modify or withdraw a concession, and at the same time inform the Secretariat. Paragraph 4 of the above-mentioned "Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII" shall apply in these cases.

6. When an unlimited tariff concession is replaced by a tariff rate quota, the amount of compensation provided should exceed the amount of the trade actually affected by the modification of the concession. The basis for the calculation of compensation should be the amount by which future trade prospects exceed the level of the quota. It is understood that the calculation of future trade prospects should be based on the greater of:

- (a) the average annual trade in the most recent representative three-year period, increased by the average annual growth rate of imports in that same period, or by 10 per cent, whichever is the greater; or
- (b) trade in the most recent year increased by 10 per cent.

In no case shall a Member's liability for compensation exceed that which would be entailed by complete withdrawal of the concession.

7. Any Member having a principal supplying interest, whether as provided for in paragraph 1 above or in paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII, in a concession which is modified or withdrawn shall be accorded an initial negotiating right in the compensatory concessions, unless another form of compensation is agreed by the Members concerned.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXVIII

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXVIII

1. General

The present text of Article XXVIII was drafted during the Review Session of 1954-55 by the Review Session Working Party on Schedules and Customs Administration, whose Report notes that the revised text reflected the view "that the Article should provide for the extension of the firm validity of the schedules by three-year periods, but with greater flexibility in the right to renegotiate and in the procedures for negotiation, both during the periods of firm validity and at the end of each period".¹ The General Agreement as agreed in 1947 provided that Schedules of concessions would have firm validity and would not be renegotiable until 1 January 1951. This date was by stages extended to 1 January 1958; at the same time the CONTRACTING PARTIES accorded "sympathetic consideration" to case-by-case requests for renegotiation of concessions.

The principal changes made to Article XXVIII in the Review Session were the provision of rights for "principal suppliers" and the insertion of paragraphs 4 and 5. "Regulations" for the use of Article XXVIII were negotiated at the same time, and were inserted as interpretative notes to Article XXVIII. These amendments came into effect on 7 October 1957.² Procedures have been adopted for renegotiations under Article XXVIII; the Procedures now in effect, which were adopted in 1980, appear in extenso at pages 960-961.

In the Uruguay Round an Understanding on Article XXVIII was agreed and was incorporated into GATT 1994. The text of this Understanding appears above.

¹L/329, adopted on 26 February 1955, 3S/205, 217, para. 27(iii).

²Declarations extending the validity of Schedules for those contracting parties with respect to which the revised Article XXVIII was not yet in effect appear at 6S/19-22 (Declaration of 30 November 1957) and 9S/29-32 (Declaration of 19 November 1960).

2. Paragraph 1

(1) “On the first day of each three-year period ...”

The Report of the Review Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration” provides that

“... the revised text of paragraph 1 of the Article should be considered with particular reference to [paragraphs] 1 to 5 [of the Interpretative Notes to Article XXVIII]. The new paragraph 1 of the revised Article provides for the automatic renewal of the firm validity of the Schedules for successive period of three years unless the CONTRACTING PARTIES specify some other period by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast. Contracting parties not wishing to accept the period thus specified will have the right of recourse to paragraph 5”.³

While the date specified in Article XXVIII:1 is the deadline for completion of renegotiations conducted thereunder, this deadline has on occasion been extended by the Council for all or for specific contracting parties.⁴

(2) “by negotiation and agreement”

During discussion of the draft of this Article and Article XXVII (which were at the time numbered as XXVI and XXV) at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, it was stated that “There is a difference between Article XXVI [XXVIII] and Article XXV [XXVII]. Article XXV [XXVII] permits a country to take action first: in other words to determine that a particular concession it negotiated with a country which does not become a contracting party will be withheld. In the case of Article XXVI [XXVIII], the intention is ... that consultation shall precede the withdrawal of the concession - that is to say, the modification of the concession. The action will not be taken first and consultation later”.⁵

(3) “any contracting party with which such concession was initially negotiated”

(a) Initial negotiating rights (INRs)

For each concession, the contracting party with whom the concession was “initially negotiated”, or holder of “initial negotiating rights” (“INR holder”), is determined generally through consulting the Schedules and the negotiating records associated with the concession. Rules for rounds of tariff negotiations before the Kennedy Round included the “principal supplier rule”, which typically stated that “Participating countries may request concessions on products of which they individually, or collectively, are the principal suppliers to the countries from which the concessions are asked. This rule shall not apply to prevent a country not a principal supplier from making a request, but the country concerned may invoke the principal supplier rule if the principal supplier of the product is not participating in the negotiations or is not a contracting party to the General Agreement”.⁶ Concessions made in these rounds were typically negotiated by the principal supplier at the time, which then became the INR holder with respect to the concession.

In addition, in many cases a contracting party other than a principal supplier has initially negotiated a concession and thereby become an INR holder, or has secured agreement to accord to it the status of INR holder (a “negotiated INR”) in respect of a concession which was initially negotiated by another contracting party. If the tariff on an item has been reduced through successive concessions over the years, the item may have a number of INRs, at different concession rates, for different contracting parties. The determination of INRs and INR holders may therefore be complex. Further concerning sources for determination of initial negotiating rights in schedules, see the discussion of schedules under Article II.

Articles II:4, XVIII:7, XVIII:18 and XXVII also refer to concessions initially negotiated, or to contracting parties with which concessions were initially negotiated.

(b) Floating initial negotiating rights

During the Kennedy Round, tariff cuts were for the first time negotiated on the basis of a general formula applied to tariff rates.⁷ During the closing days of the Kennedy Round, the Trade Negotiations Committee approved a proposal, responding to the issue posed for INRs by the use of a general tariff-cutting formula, providing that “for the generality of concessions negotiated in the Kennedy Round, no initial negotiator would be specified”.⁸ This proposal was then adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES at the Twenty-fourth Session on 16 November 1967:

“In respect of the concessions specified in the Schedules annexed to the Geneva (1967) Protocol, a contracting party shall, when the question arises, be deemed for the purposes of the General Agreement to be the contracting party with which a concession was initially negotiated if it had during a representative period prior to that time a principal supplying interest in the product concerned”.⁹

During discussion of the text of this decision in the Trade Negotiations Committee of the Kennedy Round, “it was understood that the words ‘that time’ in the text refer back to ‘when the question arises’. In other words, if a question of the type referred to arose, say, in some five or eight years, the representative period referred to would be a period related to that time”.¹⁰ At the Twenty-fourth Session, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES also noted that “the proposal would only apply in the case of concessions for which no initial negotiator was specified ... it therefore followed that the adoption of the recommendation would not affect initial negotiating rights on concessions granted before the Kennedy Round, nor would it alter the rights which Article XXVIII gave to substantial suppliers”.¹¹

In the Tokyo Round (1973-1979), the use of a tariff-cutting formula was also agreed, and concessions were thus in most cases not the result of bilateral negotiations. The following “Action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the MTN Tariff Concessions” was therefore adopted on 28 November 1979:

“1. The CONTRACTING PARTIES note that as a result of the tariff negotiations in the Multilateral Trade Negotiations, the Geneva (1979) Protocol to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the Protocol Supplementary to the Geneva (1979) Protocol have been drawn up.

“2. The CONTRACTING PARTIES adopt the following decision: in respect of the concessions specified in the Schedules annexed to the Geneva (1979) Protocol to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the Protocol Supplementary to the Geneva (1979) Protocol, a contracting party shall, when the question arises, be deemed for the purposes of the General Agreement to be a contracting party with which a concession was initially negotiated if it had during a representative period prior to the time when the question arises a principal supplying interest in the product concerned. This decision does not affect initial negotiating rights which are the result of bilateral negotiations and which have been duly notified”.¹²

In introducing the Harmonized System of tariff nomenclature, many contracting parties have conducted Article XXVIII negotiations with respect to their tariff schedules. The Council adopted a Decision on 15 June 1988 on “Floating Initial Negotiating Rights” providing that in respect of the concessions specified in the Schedules annexed to the protocols drawn up in connection with the introduction of the Harmonized System,

“a contracting party shall, when the question arises, be deemed for the purposes of the General Agreement to be a contracting party with which a concession was initially negotiated if it had during a representative period prior to the time when the question arises a principal supplying interest in the product concerned.

⁷Concerning the use of formulas in tariff negotiations see generally under Article XXVIII*bis*.

This decision does not affect initial negotiating rights which are the result of bilateral negotiations and which have been duly notified”.¹³

The Council minutes for 15 June 1988 record the following explanation by the Legal Adviser to the Director-General of the background of this Decision: “... in the Kennedy and Tokyo Rounds, tariff reductions had been granted according to an across-the-board formula. Thus, no contracting parties had acquired initial negotiating rights to most of the concessions granted, as opposed to previous rounds where results had been achieved through bilateral negotiations which clearly identified initial negotiators. Decisions taken at the end of the Kennedy and Tokyo Rounds provided that the rights of an initial negotiator would accrue to the contracting party that had the main supplying rôle at the time of a particular renegotiation of a bound item. The principal supplier would thus have the same rights as the initial negotiator would have under Article XXVIII. As the concessions resulting from the Kennedy and Tokyo Rounds had come up for renegotiation in connection with the introduction of the Harmonized System, it had proved necessary to have a similar rule for the concessions resulting from those renegotiations. Accordingly, the draft decision ... was not an amendment to Article XXVIII, but simply a definition of ‘initial negotiator’ in the context of that particular type of negotiation. The substantial suppliers would not at all be affected by it. The draft decision was required because for many concessions there were no initial negotiators in the traditional sense, hence the reference to ‘floating’ negotiating rights, which would remain ‘floating’ until they became activated in a concrete case”.¹⁴

(c) INRs and initial negotiating rights in compensatory concessions

Paragraph 7 of the Uruguay Round Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of the GATT 1994 provides as follows:

“7. Any Member having a principal supplying interest, whether as provided for in paragraph 1 above or in paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII, in a concession which is modified or withdrawn shall be accorded an initial negotiating right in the compensatory concessions, unless another form of compensation is agreed by the Members concerned.”

(4) “with any contracting party determined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to have a principal supplying interest ... and ... with any other contracting party determined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to have a substantial interest”

The original text of Article XXVIII referred only to “any contracting party determined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to have a substantial interest”. During the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee in 1947, in the discussion by the Tariff Agreement Committee of this provision, it was stated that the purpose of including this phrase was “to limit the right of other countries to hold up or delay or prevent the withdrawal or modification of the Schedule ... any country can claim that it has an interest in any item in a Schedule, and if they wish to be difficult, it would be possible for them to hold up a modification of the Schedule by claiming an interest in a commodity, their interest in which was exceedingly remote. ... the obvious thing to do was to give the right of decision to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, so that if a country claimed an interest and the country which had granted the concession did not think that that interest was sufficiently significant to give the country the right to be consulted, then it could be settled by majority vote ... and you could get on with the business”.¹⁵

The reference to contracting parties determined to have a “principal supplying interest” was inserted into Article XXVIII as one of the Review Session amendments.

See the Interpretative Notes 4-7 to paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII for a definition of these terms.

(a) Submission of claims of interest

See the “Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII” adopted on 10 November 1980, cited in extenso at page 960-961.

(b) “substantial interest”

No precise definition for “substantial interest” has ever been agreed. During the meeting of the Committee on Tariff Concessions in July 1985, it was stated that the “10 per cent share” rule had been generally applied for the definition of “substantial supplier”.¹⁶

(c) Principal supplier rights where a concession affects a major part of a contracting party’s exports

Note 5 Ad Article XXVIII:1 provides that the CONTRACTING PARTIES “may exceptionally determine that a contracting party has a principal supplying interest if the concession in question affects trade which constitutes a major part of the total exports of such contracting party.”

In 1985-86, discussions took place in the Committee on Tariff Concessions on a Swiss proposal that a test be carried out in the context of the negotiations linked to introduction of the Harmonized System, by offering a negotiating right to “the exporter for which trade in a specific product has the most importance”.¹⁷

At the September 1992 Council meeting, Argentina noted its request for recognition of its principal supplying interest with respect to concessions in the EEC Schedule on soyabeans and soyacakes on the basis that its exports to the EEC of these products constituted a major part of its total exports and therefore met the criteria in Note 5. Argentina requested the establishment of a panel to examine this claim so that the CONTRACTING PARTIES could determine this interest under Article XXVIII:1. At the November 1992 Council meeting, the EEC stated that “Argentina’s recourse to the dispute settlement mechanism in this case was inappropriate and improper” as in its view this was not a dispute between Argentina and the Community, but a dispute between Argentina and the CONTRACTING PARTIES; the EEC offered to recognize Argentina’s claim of rights subject to the later conclusions of a working group. Argentina noted that

“... paragraph 4 of the Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII adopted in November 1980 .. provided that any contracting party which considered that it had a principal or substantial supplying interest in a concession that was the subject of negotiation and consultation under Article XXVIII should communicate its claim in writing to the contracting party intending to modify or withdraw the concessions concerned. If the latter contracting party -- the Community in the present case -- recognized such a claim, that recognition would constitute a determination by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of an interest in the sense of Article XXVIII:1. If the claim was not recognized, the contracting party having made it could refer the matter to the Council. ... Clearly, if the Community and the Council did not recognize such a claim, the matter would be considered closed. However, for the Community to condition such a recognition on the establishment of a working group which would examine the consequences thereof did not make any sense, and did not square with the 1980 procedures”.¹⁸

After the EEC then reiterated its acceptance of Argentina’s principal supplying interest in soyabeans and soyacakes, the Chairman stated that “it was his understanding that the matter referred to the Council had been satisfactorily resolved between the parties concerned, and that the Council should, accordingly, take note of this”, the US representative commented that “... three options had been raised in the present discussion to resolve the matter: the first was the establishment of a working group, to which the Community had alluded but which did not appear to be satisfactory to Argentina; the second was the establishment of a panel, as requested by Argentina, and which would be an automatic Council decision if Argentina insisted on it; and the third was for some consensus whereby the Council determined that Argentina had principal supplier rights in the products concerned. ...”¹⁹

The Director-General, in support of the Chairman, said that

“... for the sake of having the Council take appropriate action to conclude this item, he would quote paragraph 4 of the 1980 Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII, which read as follows: ‘If the contracting party referred to in paragraph 1 [which intends to negotiate for the modification or withdrawal of concessions under Article XXVIII:1] recognizes the claim [of principal or substantial supplying interest], the recognition will constitute a determination by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of interest in the sense of Article XXVIII:1’. In other words, it was enough for the two parties concerned to have agreed on this matter for it to constitute a ‘determination by the CONTRACTING PARTIES’. Therefore, the Chairman was correct in proposing that the Council should take note that the matter referred to it had been satisfactorily resolved between the two parties, and nothing more.”²⁰

The Council took note of the statements, and also that the matter referred to it had been satisfactorily resolved between Argentina and the European Community.

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Uruguay Round Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of the GATT 1994 provide as follows:

“1. For the purposes of modification or withdrawal of a concession, the Member which has the highest ratio of exports affected by the concession (i.e. exports of the product to the market of the Member modifying or withdrawing the concession) to its total exports shall be deemed to have a principal supplying interest if it does not already have an initial negotiating right or a principal supplying interest as provided for in paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII. It is however agreed that this paragraph will be reviewed by the Council for Trade in Goods five years from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement with a view to deciding whether this criterion has worked satisfactorily in securing a redistribution of negotiating rights in favour of small and medium-sized exporting Members. If this is not the case, consideration will be given to possible improvements, including, in the light of the availability of adequate data, the adoption of a criterion based on the ratio of exports affected by the concession to exports to all markets of the product in question.

“2. Where a Member considers that it has a principal supplying interest in terms of paragraph 1, it should communicate its claim in writing, with supporting evidence, to the Member proposing to modify or withdraw a concession, and at the same time inform the Secretariat. Paragraph 4 of the ‘Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII’ adopted on 10 November 1980 (BISD 27S/26-28) shall apply in these cases.”

d) Principal and substantial supplier rights and trade conducted at other than most-favoured nation duty rates

Paragraph 3 of the Uruguay Round Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of the GATT 1994 provides as follows:

“In the determination of which Members have a principal supplying interest (whether as provided for in paragraph 1 [of the Understanding] or in paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII) or substantial interest, only trade in the affected product which has taken place on an MFN basis shall be taken into consideration. However, trade in the affected product which has taken place under non-contractual preferences shall also be taken into account if the trade in question has ceased to benefit from such preferential treatment, thus becoming MFN trade, at the time of the negotiation for the modification or withdrawal of the concession, or will do so by the conclusion of that negotiation.”

(6) Negotiating rights and trade in new products

Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Uruguay Round Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of the GATT 1994 provide as follows:

“4. When a tariff concession is modified or withdrawn on a new product (i.e. a product for which three years' trade statistics are not available) the Member possessing initial negotiating rights on the tariff line where the product is or was formerly classified shall be deemed to have an initial negotiating right in the concession in question. The determination of principal supplying and substantial interests and the calculation of compensation shall take into account, inter alia, production capacity and investment in the affected product in the exporting Member and estimates of export growth, as well as forecasts of demand for the product in the importing Member. For the purposes of this paragraph, ‘new product’ is understood to include a tariff item created by means of a breakout from an existing tariff line.

“5. Where a Member considers that it has a principal supplying or a substantial interest in terms of paragraph 4, it should communicate its claim in writing, with supporting evidence, to the Member proposing to modify or withdraw a concession, and at the same time inform the Secretariat. Paragraph 4 of the ... ‘Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII’ shall apply in these cases.”

(7) “modify or withdraw a concession”

See the discussion below at page 959 and following of procedures for negotiations under Article XXVIII and their relationship to the ensuing modification or rectification of schedules.

(a) Renegotiation of Schedule concessions other than tariffs

In 1956 Germany withdrew a concession relating to screen quotas for the exhibition of films of foreign origin, after renegotiations under Article XXVIII.²¹ Various concessions relating to the operation of import monopolies have been modified or withdrawn pursuant to negotiations under Article XXVIII, in the context of Article XXIV:6. In recent years some governments have included in their Schedules, in addition to tariff concessions, such non-tariff commitments as minimum import quotas²², or commitments for elimination of import permit requirements, import licensing schemes, or import prohibitions.²³ Some of these Schedules have also provided explicitly for negotiations in the event of withdrawal of these commitments; in a number of instances such Schedules have specified initial negotiating rights with respect to these commitments.

3. Paragraph 2(1) *“maintain a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions not less favourable”: concepts of equivalence of concessions

During the discussion on the provisions which became the present Article XXVIII during the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee in 1947, the addition of this sentence was suggested together with the possibility of counter-withdrawals (see paragraph 3) in order to “keep before us the objectives of the Charter to achieve a substantial reduction of tariffs, and, at the same time, permit the necessary flexibility for withdrawing individual items as an alternative to complete withdrawal from the Agreement”.²⁴

(a) Base period for determination of value of tariff concessions

In 1963, a Panel was established to render an advisory opinion to the EC and the United States in relation to the renegotiation by the EC under Article XXIV:6 of certain bound tariff concessions on poultry. The Panel examined the value to be ascribed to United States exports of poultry to the Federal Republic of Germany, on the basis of the definition of poultry provided in item 02.02 of the EEC Common Customs Tariff and the rules and practices of the GATT, and in the context of the unbindings concerning this product.

“The Panel recognized that the matter before it fell to be dealt with in the context of the Article XXIV:6 negotiations. This was relevant both to the choice of the reference period ... and to the manner in which this determination [of the value of such poultry exports as of 1 September 1960] was to be made.

“In its choice of a reference period, the Panel was guided by the practice normally followed by contracting parties in tariff negotiations, namely to lay particular emphasis on the period for which the latest data were available. As, in its view, the latest data which could reasonably have been expected to be available on 1 September 1960 would run up to 30 July 1960, the Panel decided to take as the reference period the year 1 July 1959 to 30 June 1960. ...”²⁶

The 1978 Panel Report on “Canada - Withdrawal of Tariff Concessions” examined a proposed withdrawal of concessions by Canada under Article XXVIII:3. In December 1974 the EC (acting under a prior invocation of Article XXVIII:5) notified its desire to negotiate under Article XXVIII in order to convert specific duties on unwrought lead and unwrought zinc to ad valorem rates of duty. In December 1975 the EC submitted its final report on the negotiations in which Australia had agreed on rates of duty of 3.5 per cent ad valorem on both lead and zinc; no agreement had been reached with Canada. The EC then introduced these new duty rates on 1 January 1976. In May 1976 Canada notified proposed withdrawals of bindings on various items in the Canadian tariff schedule, the trade coverage of which was equivalent to the annual average figure for Canada’s total exports to the Community of zinc in the period 1973-75. Canada did not contest the final rate on lead.²⁷

“The Panel based its consideration of the case on Article XXVIII of the GATT which, as both parties agreed, was the applicable provision, inter alia, for negotiations which are undertaken with the aim of converting specific rates of duty into ad valorem rates. In this connexion, the Panel considered of special importance paragraph 2 of Article XXVIII which provides that the contracting parties concerned ‘shall endeavour to maintain a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions not less favourable to trade than that provided for in this Agreement prior to such negotiations’.

“The Panel noted that as a general principle, Article XXVIII negotiations had in the past been based on the most recent three-year period for which trade statistics were available, for the purpose of determining principal or substantial supplier rights. It was also the understanding of the Panel that in past negotiations a three-year period had been used as an element in the determination of the value of tariff concessions. The Panel noted on the other hand that no clear precedent could be found as regards the selection of a base period for the purpose of converting specific into ad valorem rates of duty. In the absence of agreement between the parties on an appropriate base period, the Panel held that the general principle of using the most recent three-year period should be applied to this case as well in order to allow account to be taken of cyclical movements and random events.”²⁸

“The Panel does not consider that full statistics for the applicable base period must be available at the very beginning of the negotiations, provided these data become available later in the negotiations and the latter are not unduly delayed. By June 1975, Community statistics (on which Canada had agreed to conduct the negotiations) for the first ten or eleven months of 1974 became available (except for Ireland) for both lead and zinc. The offer of the Community in the negotiations on both lead and zinc, submitted to Canada in late June 1975, should therefore, in the Panel's view, have taken account of trade figures for 1974. The Panel came to the conclusion that a correct and reasonable interpretation of the GATT, in the particular circumstances applying in this case, would be to base the ad valorem equivalents on global trade statistics for the years 1972-74. The Panel, in basing its decision on figures relating to global Community imports of zinc rather than relating to imports from Canada only, took account of the provision of Article XXVIII:2 which refers to the maintenance of a 'general level' of concessions, not less favourable to 'trade', formulations which in the view of the Panel clearly indicate the requirement, in the absence of specific agreement between the parties, to base the ad valorem equivalent of a specific duty on total import figures. To take another view would, in the case of two or more principal or substantial suppliers with different price levels, result in different ad valorem rates which is inconceivable under the General Agreement. The 1972-74 figures submitted to the Panel by the Community indicate an ad valorem equivalent of 2.64 per cent for total Community imports of zinc. Consequently, the Panel considers that, as it was not the intention of the Community to modify the scope of the concession, the ad valorem duty rate of the Community for zinc should have been rebound, after conversion, at that level or at the closest round half-percentage point figure, rather than at 3.5 per cent".²⁹

The Panel found that Canada was entitled to proceed to a withdrawal of concessions; see at page 948 below.

(b) Tariff conversion on the basis of weighted averages

The 1978 Panel Report on "Canada - Withdrawal of Tariff Concessions", referred to directly above, goes on to note that:

"In the Panel's view, this result would also be appropriate when considering lead and zinc together. ... the Panel noted that the trade-weighted ad valorem equivalent for both products together for the years 1972-74 amount to 2.97 per cent, a figure indicating that a rebinding for lead of 3.5 per cent (as implemented by the Community) and for zinc at the lower level, as indicated in the previous paragraph, would have been in conformity with the requirement of Article XXVIII:2 of the GATT".³⁰

See also the Report of the "Panel on Vitamins"³¹ discussed under Article II.

(c) Renegotiation following an increase in the value of a concession

The 1984 Report of the "Panel on Newsprint" examined the claim of Canada concerning the application of a tariff concession on newsprint established by the European Communities. The concession in the EC's Schedule LXXII provided for an annual tariff quota of 1.5 million tonnes duty-free, leaving the bound duty rate at 7 per cent for imports exceeding that quota. Under agreements between the EC and the EFTA countries, newsprint imports from EFTA countries became duty-free as from 1 January 1984, and the EC then opened a duty-free tariff quota for m.f.n. suppliers of 500,000 tonnes for newsprint for the year 1984.

"... the Panel concluded that the EC, in unilaterally establishing for 1984 a duty-free quota of 500,000 tonnes, had not acted in conformity with their obligations under Article II of the GATT. The Panel shared the view expressed before it relating to the fundamental importance of the security and predictability of GATT tariff bindings, a principle which constitutes a central obligation in the system of the General Agreement. ...

"While holding that the right of Canada to compete within a duty-free tariff quota of 1.5 million tonnes has been impaired by the EC action, the Panel recognized, however, that as a result of newsprint imports from EFTA countries entering the EC market duty-free since 1 January 1984 under the terms of the free-trade agreements, the value of the EC concession had greatly increased for non-EFTA suppliers and especially for Canada as the most important m.f.n. supplier. The Panel concluded that this increased value of the concession justifies the EC engaging in renegotiations under Article XXVIII, in accordance with the customary procedures and practices for such negotiations, with the objective of achieving some reduction in the size of the tariff quota. In the view of the Panel, such a reduction would, in a case like the one before the Panel where the increased value of the concession derives from an action by the EC to grant duty-free access to newsprint imports from the EFTA countries, be without payment of compensation. In this connection, the Panel found that although the statistical data before it did not differentiate between imports entering duty-free under the GATT quota and those under the autonomous régime, the fact that the GATT quota was filled while total Canadian exports never exceeded half that quota is evidence that the EFTA countries did participate in the GATT quota up until the end of 1983.

“The Panel carefully noted and examined the statement by the EC that, should the Panel consider the action taken by the EC as not being in conformity with the GATT, they might proceed to option (b) under which the tariff quota would be maintained at 1.5 million tonnes but that imports from all sources, including the EFTA countries, would be recorded against that quota; once the latter had been filled, the Community’s formal contractual obligations would have been met. While the Panel could find no specific GATT provision forbidding such action and no precedents to guide it, it considered that this would not be an appropriate solution to the problem and would create an unfortunate precedent. It is in the nature of a duty-free tariff quota to allow specified quantities of imports into a country duty-free which would otherwise be dutiable, which is not the case for EFTA imports by virtue of the free-trade agreements. Imports which are already duty-free, due to a preferential agreement, cannot by their very nature participate in an m.f.n. duty-free quota. The situation in this respect could only change if the free-trade agreements with the EFTA countries were to be discontinued; in this case these countries would be entitled to fall back on their GATT rights vis-à-vis the EC, which rights continue to exist.

“On the basis of the findings and conclusions reached above, the Panel suggests that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend that the European Communities engage promptly in renegotiations under the procedures of Article XXVIII of the GATT with regard to the tariff quota on newsprint in Schedule LXXII. Further, the Panel suggests that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend to the European Communities that, pending the termination of such negotiations, the duty-free tariff quota of 1.5 million tonnes for m.f.n. suppliers be maintained”.³²

(d) Renegotiation and institution of a tariff quota

Paragraph 6 of the Uruguay Round Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of the GATT 1994 provides as follows:

“6. When an unlimited tariff concession is replaced by a tariff rate quota, the amount of compensation provided should exceed the amount of the trade actually affected by the modification of the concession. The basis for the calculation of compensation should be the amount by which future trade prospects exceed the level of the quota. It is understood that the calculation of future trade prospects should be based on the greater of:

“(a) the average annual trade in the most recent representative three-year period, increased by the average annual growth rate of imports in that same period, or by 10 per cent, whichever is the greater; or

“(b) trade in the most recent year increased by 10 per cent.

³²L/5680, adopted on 20 November 1984, 31S/114, 131-133, paras. 52, 54-56.

4. Paragraph 3

(1) “shall be free ... to withdraw ... substantially equivalent concessions”

(a) Basis and consequences of withdrawals under paragraph 3

During discussions on the provisions which became the present Article XXVIII, in the Tariff Agreement Committee at Geneva in 1947, the proposal to include a paragraph providing for the right to make compensatory withdrawals was explained as follows: “... if we wish to take an item out of our Schedule then clearly it is fair and proper that the countries with whom we negotiate should be free to make the corresponding changes in their Schedules in order to restore the balance. ... but we want any such exercise to be limited to what is corresponding and not to be used in a punitive way”.³³

Later, when the Tariff Agreement Committee discussed the draft of Article XXVIII, which was phrased “suspend ... the application to the trade of the contracting party taking such action, of substantially equivalent concessions”, the question was put whether - given the similarity to the nullification and impairment provisions proposed - it was intended that action be discriminatory. It was stated in reply that “There is only a question here of withdrawal of concessions; there is no question of discriminatory measures against a particular country”³⁴ and “this is, so to speak, a negotiation in reverse. It is not like the Nullification Article...”³⁵ The Chairman in summing up stated: “It was agreed that there was no intention to interfere in any way with the operation of the most-favoured-nation clause. This Article is headed ‘Modification of Schedules’. It refers throughout to concessions negotiated under paragraph 1 of Article II, the Schedules, and there is no reference in the Article to Article I, which is the Most-Favoured-Nation clause. Therefore, I think the intent is clear: that in no way should this Article interfere with the operation of the Most-Favoured-Nation clause.”³⁶ It was also agreed then that by “non-discriminatory action to adjust the balance of the Schedules ... we mean withdrawal and not suspension of concessions”.³⁷ The Committee altered the provision accordingly. The issue of contracting parties affected by counter-withdrawals was also raised at that time. It was stated that “it is probably not desirable to carry it beyond the stage of the original action and the countermeasures. ... if unfairness does result from the practical action of those measures, it will have to be sorted out by the [CONTRACTING PARTIES]”.³⁸

The 1990 Award by the Arbitrator on “Canada/European Communities - Article XXVIII Rights”, also referred to at page 951 below, notes concerning compensatory withdrawal of concessions under Article XXVIII:3 by Canada that “Should Canada exercise her right to withdraw concessions, she undertakes obligations to compensate third countries having negotiating rights in respect of Canada for the products on which concessions would be withdrawn.”³⁹

(b) Extent of withdrawals under paragraph 3

In introducing the draft of Article XXVIII during the discussions of the Tariff Agreement Committee at Geneva, the chairman of the ad-hoc Sub-committee which drafted it stated, regarding the draft: “It was agreed in the Sub-Committee that both the contracting parties with which a concession was initially negotiated and a contracting party which was substantially affected should have the right to withdraw substantially equivalent concessions. What was a substantially equivalent concession would be determined in the light of what the party concerned had paid for the concession which had been withdrawn. It was also agreed that, since the contracting party which proposes to withdraw a concession or to modify a concession has, under the proposed draft, been given the right to act if negotiations break down without having to seek the approval of the [CONTRACTING PARTIES], the same right should be given to any other contracting party which is affected by the action.”⁴⁰

See also Note 6 Ad Article XXVIII:1, which provides that the applicant contracting party should not “have to pay compensation or suffer retaliation greater than the withdrawal or modification sought, judged in the light of the conditions of trade at the time of the proposed withdrawal or modification, making allowance for any discriminatory quantitative restrictions maintained by the applicant contracting party”.

In 1963, a Panel was established to render an advisory opinion to the EC and the United States in relation to the renegotiation by the EC under Article XXIV:6 of certain bound tariff concessions on poultry; concerning the reference period used, see above at page 944. The Panel examined the value to be ascribed to United States exports of poultry to the Federal Republic of Germany, on the basis of the definition of poultry provided in item 02.02 of the EEC Common Customs Tariff and the rules and practices of the GATT, and in the context of the unbindings concerning this product.

“The Panel recognized that the matter before it fell to be dealt with in the context of the Article XXIV:6 negotiations. This was relevant both to the choice of the reference period ... and to the manner in which this determination [of the value of such poultry exports as of 1 September 1960] was to be made. ...

“The Panel was satisfied that it was in accordance with the normal practice of the GATT for a correction to be made to the figures for the reference period to take account of the discriminatory quantitative restrictions existing in the Federal Republic of Germany during that period.

“It was the Panel’s view that, in the absence of such quantitative restrictions, United States exports would have had a larger share of the existing German market. Moreover, the unrestricted entry of lower-priced United States poultry would have brought about an increase in German consumption and United States exports would also have had a share in this increase. The Panel then attempted to assess what the United States could reasonably have expected that the value of their exports would have been in the reference period had there been no discriminatory quantitative restrictions.

“The Panel considered that it could not reasonably be argued that the whole of the increase in German consumption of poultry would have been taken up by United States exports. It was certainly to be expected that the other supplying countries would adjust their price policies in an endeavour to maintain their share of the market. Account also had to be taken of the additional sources of supply resulting from new production in certain European countries. The Panel felt, however, that the share in the reference period of the various exporting countries in the Swiss market, which was free and competitive, afforded a fair guide as to the proportion of the increased German poultry consumption likely to be taken up by United States exports.

“Having taken account of these factors, and basing itself entirely on the information which could have been known on 1 September 1960, the Panel came to the conclusion that the advisory opinion it should render to the parties concerned was that a figure of $26 million would reasonably represent the value to be ascribed, as of 1 September 1960, in the context of the unbindings concerning this product, to United States exports of poultry to the Federal Republic of Germany ...”⁴¹

The 1978 Panel Report on “Canada - Withdrawal of Tariff Concessions” concluded, on the basis of the findings noted above at pages 944-945:

“... Canada was entitled, in the Panel’s opinion, to proceed to a withdrawal of concessions. The Panel, however, was of the view that the withdrawal of concessions should have been less than the equivalent of the total export volume of zinc to the Community as account should have been taken of the rebinding of the Community duty. Also, the right of retaliation should be related to the actual damage suffered by Canada and consequently the withdrawals should have been based on the difference between the ad valorem equivalent of the specific rate calculated on imports from Canada only and the new ad valorem rate. Finally, account should have been taken of the fact that the ad valorem duty on lead had been fixed at a level lower than the incidence in respect of Community imports from Canada. In view of the complexity of assessing the value of a tariff binding, irrespective of the rate of duty involved, the Panel abstained from making any quantitative assessment in this respect. In the interest of maintaining the highest possible general level of concessions the Panel finds that the Canadian retaliatory action should be withdrawn; i.e. that the previous Canadian tariff bindings should be re-established as soon as the Community proceeds either to decrease their tariff on zinc or to make tariff concessions on other products of export interest to Canada of an equivalent value.”⁴²

At the May 1988 Council meeting, in discussion of the follow-up to the 1987 Panel Report on “United States - Taxes on Petroleum and Certain Imported Substances” and a related request by the EEC for authorization to suspend concessions with respect to the United States, the Legal Advisor to the Director-General stated as follows:

“There had never been any decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES regarding the actual calculation of the level of damage. The most common case involved the withdrawal of tariff concessions, for which there were fairly well established criteria that were taken into account in the calculation of compensation. The first criterion was the development of the imports during, normally, the three years before the renegotiations started. What was taken into account was not just a statistical average, but also the trend in the development of trade during that period. Furthermore, account was taken of the size of the tariff increase being negotiated. Moreover, an estimate was made of the price elasticity of the product concerned. The CONTRACTING PARTIES had agreed on two occasions that it was not possible to draw up firm rules for the calculation of damage in such cases, and that it had to be left to the negotiators in each individual case to calculate what they considered to be the damage and the appropriate compensation. ...”⁴³

In Council meetings in 1988 and 1989, the European Community, stating that the United States transposition of its tariff schedule to the Harmonized System had resulted in increased duties on certain textiles inconsistent with Section 2 of the Decision of 12 July 1983 on “GATT Concessions under the Harmonized Commodity Description and Coding System”, proposed that its differences of view with the United States on these items be submitted to arbitration by the Director-General. The United States stated that since both the Community and the United States had achieved a balance, any examination of the conversion should review the overall balance of concessions on both sides; the United States did not believe that arbitration was a tool well-suited for such broad-gauged evaluation. The Council took note of the statements.⁴⁴

(c) Pre-requisites for compensatory withdrawals under Article XXVIII:3

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have decided in many instances to grant or extend waivers suspending the application of Article II of the General Agreement to enable a contracting party to implement a modified Schedule in advance of completion of negotiations under Article XXVIII, subject to specified conditions. In recent years, the following conditions have been included in most cases:

- “1. The Government of [contracting party] will as soon as possible enter into negotiations or consultations pursuant to paragraphs 1 to 3 of Article XXVIII.
- “2. The negotiations or consultations mentioned above shall be completed not later than [date].
- “3. Pending the entry into force of the results of the negotiations or consultations mentioned above, the other contracting parties will be free to suspend concessions initially negotiated with [contracting party] to the extent that they consider that adequate compensation is not offered by the Government of [contracting party].”⁴⁵

At the June 1988 Council meeting, in the discussion of the waivers requested by Bangladesh and Mexico in connection with their implementation of the Harmonized System:

"The representative of Jamaica noted that paragraphs 1 and 3 of Article XXVIII required prior action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES acting jointly if a contracting party sought to withdraw concessions in terms of ensuring compensation, while paragraph 2 did not require a prior determination by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. With this in view, he pointed out that paragraph 1 in each of two of the draft decisions referred to negotiations and consultations with interested contracting parties pursuant to paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of Article XXVIII, while paragraph 3 of the draft decisions merely stated that other contracting parties would be free to suspend concessions initially negotiated to the extent that they considered that adequate compensation was not offered by the government seeking the waiver. He asked for clarification on this point.

"... the Legal Adviser to the Director-General said that paragraph 3 of the two draft decisions only foresaw a temporary situation before the negotiations were actually terminated and the results entered into force. The final corresponding situation was covered by paragraph 3(a) of Article XXVIII, which did not provide for any approval by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The only requirement was that contracting parties which had negotiating rights under Article XXVIII had to notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES that they intended to withdraw substantially equivalent concessions. They did not have to ask for permission to do so".⁴⁶

(d) Time-limits for invocation of Article XXVIII:3 (including application in the context of Article XXIV:6)

During the Review Session of 1954-55, in a discussion of the Declaration on Continued Application of the Schedules, the Executive Secretary observed that the notice period provided in the Declaration for modifications or withdrawals referred to "the date on which the change affected the Schedule of the contracting party rather than the date on which the duty was formally altered by internal action of the contracting party".⁴⁷

At the Council meeting of 26 April 1974, "The representative of the United States stated that the United States and the European Communities had not yet concluded their negotiations under Article XXIV:6 under the applicable procedures of Article XXVIII. He pointed out that the United Kingdom, Denmark and Ireland had been applying import treatment in accordance with their Accession agreements with the European Communities, rather than in accordance with their Schedules referred to in Article II. This raised the question of whether the concessions should be considered withdrawn or modified as of 1 January 1974. He felt that if this were the case, Article XXVIII:3 could be interpreted as requiring notification to the CONTRACTING PARTIES of any compensatory withdrawals on or before 31 May 1974". The representative of the EC stated that it "did not consider that the time-limit laid down in Article XXVIII:3 posed a problem at the present time, because the renegotiations were still in progress and the six-month period mentioned in that Article would run only as from the end of the renegotiations". In response to a joint request made by the US and the EC, "the Council decided that without prejudice to the interpretation of Article XXVIII:3 the six-month period referred to in Article XXVIII:3 would not be considered to expire prior to 31 August 1974".⁴⁸

At the Council meeting of 19 July 1974, the EC representative stated that the Communities considered the renegotiations under Article XXIV:6 to be terminated, and intended as of 31 July to withdraw the schedules of concessions of the Six and of Denmark, Ireland, and the United Kingdom and replace them with two new schedules for the Community of Nine, one relating to the EEC and one to the ECSC. The representatives of the United States and of Australia each stated that the negotiations pursuant to Article XXIV:6 had not achieved satisfactory results with respect to compensation for certain specific concessions. The United States and Australia each reserved the right under Article XXVIII:3 to withdraw substantially equivalent concessions: with respect to those concessions; with respect to any modification made by the EC to its schedules pursuant to its reservation mentioned below; with respect to any modification by the EC to its schedules referred to in the Report filed by that country and the EC on the Article XXIV:6 negotiations; and with respect to any failure by the EC to implement the concessions in these new schedules on or before 31 July 1974. The EC representative stated that the EC considered that the concessions in its new schedules provided full compensation for the withdrawals in question, and noted that the EC had inserted in those schedules a reservation reserving the right to make counter-withdrawals in the event of withdrawals by its trading partners after the Article XXIV:6 negotiations. The Council agreed that the six-month period referred to in Article XXVIII:3 would not apply to actions pursuant to these reservations and that such actions could be taken at any time upon expiration of thirty days from the day that written notice is given to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.⁴⁹

At the Council meeting of 24 March 1975, Canada and the EC gave notice of: a Joint Declaration which stated that they had been able to reach agreement in their Article XXIV:6 negotiations except for certain cereal items; a statement by the EC regarding inclusion in its Schedules of the reservation above regarding counter-withdrawals; and a statement by Canada that its adherence to the Declaration “in no way implies acceptance by Canada of General Note 1 in the draft new Schedules LXXII and LXXII*bis*, nor limits Canada’s right to request the CONTRACTING PARTIES to examine whether the reservation of rights envisaged in this General Note is consistent with the European Communities’ obligations under the provisions of the General Agreement”. The Council agreed to the joint request by Canada and the European Communities to extend the time-limit under Article XVIII:3 insofar as certain cereal items were concerned.⁵⁰

The 1990 Award by the Arbitrator on “Canada/European Communities - Article XXVIII Rights” finds, concerning the Agreement on Quality Wheat concluded by Canada with the Community on 29 March 1962:

“Given the fact that wheat exports to the European Economic Community are of great importance to Canada, given the fact that it was not known in 1962 what the import restrictions on wheat would be under the CAP, and given the fact that the parties were under considerable pressure to conclude the XXIV:6 negotiations, given these facts and the safe assumption that the parties were fully versed and competent in GATT matters and were acting in good faith, on the basis of these considerations I reach the conclusion that the purpose of these agreements was to place Canada in a legal position equivalent to the one she would be in if the time-limits of Article XXVIII did not apply. Otherwise, I see no reason for Canada to have signed them”.⁵¹

The Award further notes:

“The question still remains whether, by formally acknowledging the conclusion in 1962 of the XXIV:6 Negotiations (which followed the procedures of Article XXVIII) Canada lost her right to invoke the provisions of Article XXVIII:3, including the right to withdraw equivalent concessions. This paragraph of Article XXIII can be invoked only if an agreement cannot be reached. Moreover, there are severe time-limits tied to the exercise of this right to withdraw. These have long since expired so far as the 1960-62 XXIV:6 negotiations are concerned.

“However, as noted earlier, I conclude that the very purpose of this bilateral agreement was to put Canada into a legal position equivalent to the one it would be in if the time-limits of Article XXVIII did not apply.

“It follows that Canada still maintains a right to withdraw equivalent concessions if the negotiations under the bilateral agreement are not successfully concluded.

“In sum, I conclude that Canada maintains through the bilateral Agreement of 29 March 1962 with respect to Quality Wheat all the negotiating rights provided for in Article XXVIII, or their equivalent.

“It needs stressing that the time-limits established in Article XXVIII:3 have, inter alia, the purpose of safeguarding the interests of third countries. Should Canada exercise her right to withdraw concessions, she undertakes obligations to compensate third countries having negotiating rights in respect of Canada for the products on which concessions would be withdrawn.”⁵²

A communication from the United States of 30 November 1990⁵³ noted that because, in connection with the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Communities, the EC had effected the withdrawal of Spain’s concession on corn and sorghum and replaced them with variable levies, and no agreement had been reached on compensation under Articles XXIV:6 and XXVIII, the United States had notified in May 1986 the suspension of certain concessions in Schedule XX⁵⁴, but that these concessions had been restored subject to the provisions of an agreement between the United States and the EC under Article XXIV:6 concluded 29 January 1987, which set forth certain compensatory measures, provided for a review, and “reserved full GATT rights including those which would otherwise be time-limited”.⁵⁵ The Communication notified suspension of certain concessions in Schedule XX to take effect midnight 31 December 1990, and stated:

“Where a contracting party to the GATT has withdrawn a concession in the expansion of a customs union, Article XXIV entitles other contracting parties to negotiated compensation, or, in the absence of a successful negotiation, to use Article XXVIII to ‘withdraw substantially equivalent concessions’. The Article XXVIII right is time-limited to six months. The agreed ‘review of the situation’ began in July and has not resulted in a negotiated continuation of compensation to the United States. If negotiations to continue compensation to the United States are not successful, then compensation under the 1987 agreement will expire at midnight on December 31, 1990. Moreover, the time-limited Article XXVIII right could be construed, in this case, to expire on December 31, 1990 unless exercised”.⁵⁶

The European Communities’ reply of 7 December 1990 stated that

“The Community view is that this bilateral agreement [of January 1987] concluded the negotiations between the two sides under Article XXIV:6 and that the compensation was therefore part of a final settlement. ... The United States appears to consider that this review provision represents a continuation of the tariff negotiations under Article XXIV:6. As indicated above, the Community does not share this view, since those tariff negotiations were concluded in early 1987 and the two parties are no longer in a tariff negotiation in terms of Article XXVIII. In any event the proposed action by the United States on 1 January 1991 is neither necessary nor justified; either GATT rights under Article XXVIII exist - in which case they are not time-limited, under the terms of the agreement - or such rights do not exist, in which case US action is illegal in GATT”.⁵⁷

The US later gave notice that as the EC had agreed to extend the provisions of the January 1987 agreement until 31 December 1991 it would not suspend such concessions at that time, but reserved its rights with respect to the withdrawals announced by the EC on 13 February 1986.⁵⁸ The two parties later jointly notified the agreement of the EC to extend the provisions set forth in the annexes to the January 1987 agreement until December 1992 and December 1993.⁵⁹

Time-limits under Article XXVIII:3 were also extended in the case of the transposition of the United States schedule into the Harmonized System tariff nomenclature.⁶⁰ See also the discussion of time-limits under Article XIX:3.

(2) Invocations of Article XXVIII:3

The tables on the use of Article XXVIII which follow this chapter include all instances of compensatory withdrawals under Article XXVIII:3 (except for Article XXVIII:3 withdrawals under Article XXIV:6). The only instances noted in these tables are action by Australia in February 1968 following the withdrawal by the EC of concessions on certain types of cheese⁶¹, action by Canada in May 1976 following the conversion by the EC of specific duties on lead and zinc into ad valorem duties⁶² and action by Canada in March 1986 following the increase of the applied rate of duty on single-strength orange juice by the United States.⁶³ A 1983 Secretariat Note on Article XXVIII states:

“... In the majority of Article XXVIII cases, a satisfactory agreement was reached between the parties concerned. ... The very rare use of the retaliation provision of Article XXVIII:3 would therefore appear to be based on the fact that in almost all cases negotiations were successful and partly also because of the difficulty inherent in finding appropriate concessions with regard to which retaliatory action can be taken; the latter point applies especially to countries with a limited number of tariff concessions”.⁶⁴

(1) “The CONTRACTING PARTIES may ... authorize a contracting party to enter into negotiations”

The renegotiation procedure “in special circumstances” in paragraph 4 was added to Article XXVIII as one of the amendments agreed in the Review Session of 1954-55. It incorporated elements of the procedures for “sympathetic consideration” of requests for renegotiation in “exceptional circumstances” during the period of validity of schedules, described below at page 963.

The Report of the Review Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration” notes that “paragraph 4 is intended to bring into the Agreement a provision for renegotiations under authority obtained from the CONTRACTING PARTIES in special circumstances, on the lines of the ‘sympathetic consideration’ procedures adopted at the eighth session, but providing in certain circumstances for modification or withdrawal even if the negotiations are not successful”.⁶⁵ The Intersessional Procedures adopted at the Review Session provided that the Intersessional Committee “shall examine applications for authority, in special circumstances, to enter into negotiations for the modification or withdrawal of concessions included in Schedules to the Agreement and shall act for the CONTRACTING PARTIES in performing the functions prescribed in any procedures and conditions established by them”.⁶⁶ This and other functions of the Intersessional Committee were conferred upon the Council of Representatives at its establishment in 1960.⁶⁷

The 1986 Report of the Committee on Tariff Concessions notes that “At the Council meeting of 17 June 1986, following a request by a country under Article XXVIII:4 for authority to renegotiate its schedule in view of the introduction of the Harmonized System, one delegation suggested that a general decision should be taken to allow countries which have not reserved their rights under Article XXVIII:5 to renegotiate their schedules. The Committee was requested to examine this question ... and came to the conclusion that there was no need for a general decision because countries were always free to present requests to the Council”.⁶⁸

The tables of invocations of Article XXVIII which follow this chapter include a complete list of invocations of Article XXVIII:4. As of March 1994, Article XXVIII:4 or the “sympathetic consideration” procedures which preceded it had been invoked 66 times, primarily in the period before 1965.

In March 1992, the Report of the Members of the Reconvened Oilseeds Panel on “Follow-up on the Panel Report ‘EEC - Payments and Subsidies paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins’” made the following recommendation: “The Panel ... recommends that the Community should act expeditiously to eliminate the impairment of the tariff concessions -- either by modifying its new support system for oilseeds or by renegotiating its tariff concessions for oilseeds under Article XXVIII. In the event that the dispute is not resolved expeditiously in either of these ways, the CONTRACTING PARTIES should, if so requested by the United States, consider further action under Article XXIII:2 of the General Agreement.”⁶⁹ On 4 June 1992 the EEC requested the authorization of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to enter into negotiations under Article XXVIII:4 for modification of the EEC concessions with respect to soya beans, rape or colza seeds, sunflower seeds, and oilcake included in Schedule LXXX - EEC, stating that “This procedure will enable the negotiations to be concluded rapidly and ensure that they take place under the full control of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.”⁷⁰ During the Council discussion of this request, the EEC representative stated that:

“... The Panel had ... given the Community a free choice between the two options, while insisting on the need to act expeditiously ... In the Community’s view, Article XXVIII offered two options: the multilateral option in paragraph 4, and what was in effect a bilateral option in paragraph 5. The Community had opted for the provision of Article XXVIII which it believed would give the most satisfaction at the multilateral level and which would, at the same time, allow the CONTRACTING PARTIES to have a degree of control over the proceedings. The bilateral option in paragraph 5, furthermore, did not provide any strict guarantee as to the time period for the procedures to be followed thereunder, and would be determined by the free choice of the two parties concerned... As he had stated earlier, paragraph 4 permitted the CONTRACTING PARTIES to exercise some control and almost permanent monitoring over the negotiations thereunder, as stipulated in its sub-paragraphs (c) and (d). Furthermore, these provisions provided very strict time frames: thirty days for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to decide whether to authorize a contracting party to enter into renegotiations; sixty days thereafter for the contracting parties primarily concerned to reach agreement; and thirty days for a final determination by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under sub-paragraph (d)”.⁷¹

This authorization was granted on 19 June 1992.⁷²

(2) “in special circumstances”

In discussion at the Review Session of 1954-55 concerning continued application of the Schedules, “the Executive Secretary pointed out that if the transposition of a tariff from specific to ad valorem duties in fact involved modifications or withdrawals of concessions, then contracting parties were obliged to act under Article XXVIII. Such a transposition, however, would fall under the qualification of ‘special circumstances’ and could therefore take place under the revised paragraph 4 of Article XXVIII”.⁷³ See also the discussion of conversion from specific to ad valorem duties under Article II.

The 1958 Report of the Working Party on “Conversion of Specific Duties in the Norwegian Schedule” examined the proposal of the Norwegian Government, consequent to the adoption of the Brussels Nomenclature, to convert a number of specific duties in Schedule XIV into ad valorem duties. The Report notes that “The Working Party wishes to record that it considers the circumstances in which the application was made to be such as would warrant a finding of ‘special circumstances’ within the terms of paragraph 4 of Article XXVIII”.⁷⁴

In 1970, during the discussion in the Council of a request for an authorization under Article XXVIII:4 to renegotiate a tariff concession, it was stated “that for reasons of principle it was essential to stress that the abolition of a quantitative restriction should not be used as the pretext for a duty increase”.⁷⁵

In 1973, during the discussion in the Council of what constituted the “special circumstances” in terms of a request under Article XXVIII:4, it was stated “that the question of defining special circumstances had been raised in the Council before and that it would not be a good policy to define special circumstances too rigorously, since it could encourage contracting parties to invoke paragraph 5 of Article XXVIII more easily”.⁷⁶ economies or as an important source of revenue". See also the provisions of Article XVIII:7 permitting "out of season" renegotiations by those contracting parties which fall under Article XVIII:4(a).

(3) "refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES"

At the September/October 1992 Council meeting, the EEC noted that in 16 August 1992, it had referred the matter of its negotiations concerning certain oilseeds items under Article XXVIII:4 to the CONTRACTING PARTIES: "The Community had brought this matter before the Council under ... Article XXVIII:4, and after it had exhausted the provisions in paragraph (a) thereof, and since (b) unfortunately did not apply, it had had to move on to paragraph (c) ... Under Article XXVIII:4(d) it was incumbent upon the 'applicant contracting party' – the Community in this case – to refer the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES if an agreement had not been reached in sixty days".⁷⁷

This has been the only instance of invocation of paragraphs (c) or (d) of Article XXVIII:4.

(4) "the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall promptly examine the matter and submit their views to the contracting parties primarily concerned with the aim of achieving a settlement"

At the September/October 1992 Council meeting, the EEC, noting this referral, stated three series of questions concerning the interpretation of Article XXVIII, and requested the establishment of a working group to assist the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the interpretation of Article XXVIII.⁷⁸ Consensus was not reached on this request.

At the same meeting, the United States proposed binding arbitration concerning the total value to be ascribed to the impairment of tariff concessions in the oilseeds area by the Community's subsidy programme. At the November Council meeting, the EEC stated that no further decision on action under Article XXIII should be taken until the Article XXVIII:4 procedure authorized in June had been exhausted. Consensus was not reached on this request, nor on the later United States request for authorization to suspend concessions under Article XXIII:2.⁷⁹ At the Forty-eighth Session in December 1992, the EC representative noted that negotiations between the Community and the United States had led to a compromise agreed ad referendum which would enable the Community to end its Article XXVIII:4 negotiations with the United States.⁸⁰ At the June 1993 Council meeting the EC representative noted that this compromise had been approved by the EC Council of Ministers and the EC would resume negotiations as quickly as possible.⁸¹

(1) "reserve the right ... to modify the appropriate schedule"

The Report of the Review Working Party on "Schedules and Customs Administration" notes:

"Concerning paragraph 5, the Ninth Session Working Party on Schedules and Customs Administration wishes to place on record, in order to eliminate any possibility of misunderstanding that, without prejudice to the provisions of [interpretative Note 3 to paragraph 1], a reservation of the right under that paragraph to modify a schedule applies to the whole schedule and cannot apply to selected items only".⁸²

During the GATT Council meeting in December 1981, the representative of Australia said "that Australia was currently conducting a series of negotiations with a number of its trading partners under the provisions of Article XXVIII:1, and expressed the hope that these negotiations would be concluded prior to 1 January 1982. He said that in the event that these negotiations had not been finalized by that date, Australia would continue any ongoing discussions after 1 January 1982 under the provisions of Article XXVIII:5". In reply, the EC representative said that “the late notification of products by Australia and the incomplete communication of statistical figures had seriously diminished the time available for negotiation. In his view, the entry into force of the increased rates on 1 January 1982, in the event that the negotiations could not be completed within the very short deadline, would not be in conformity with normal GATT procedures in this respect, nor was the Australian intention to transform concessions that had been granted prior to 1965 without providing up-to-date statistics. He stated that the European Economic Community expressly reserved all its GATT rights on both these points and hoped that Australia would abide by GATT procedures before proceeding to any withdrawals or transformations of concessions”.⁸³

Problems related to the interpretation and application of paragraph 5 in case of a pre-emptive tariff increase against a new product prior to its full-scale commercial production and trade (e.g. determination of “initial negotiator”, “principal supplier” and “substantial interest” in the absence of sizeable trade, and calculation of compensation in case of the prospect of rapid future trade growth of the new product) were discussed on several occasions in the GATT Council⁸⁴, in the Committee on Tariff Concessions⁸⁵ and in submissions by individual contracting parties.⁸⁶

(2) Invocations of Article XXVIII:5

Tables on the invocation of Article XXVIII:5 follow this chapter. Whereas for the first three-year period 1958-60, only four contracting parties reserved their right to modify their schedule, the number had risen to twelve for the period 1973-75 and stands at 37 for the present period of 1994-1996. A Secretariat Note of 1983 for the Committee on Tariff Concessions concerning the use of Article XXVIII states:

“It would appear ... that countries increasingly tend to invoke paragraph 5 of Article XXVIII even though a need for renegotiations of bound rates for particular products might not be in sight at the time of the invocation. In this context, concern has been expressed about the insecurity of tariff bindings if countries, having invoked the provision in question, may at any time (during a three-year period) proceed to a modification or withdrawal of existing concessions”.⁸⁷

During the meeting of the Committee on Tariff Concessions in April 1982, it was “noted that certain delegations had made abundant use of Article XXVIII:5 procedures, so that negotiations had been excessively prolonged. Perhaps these prolongations had led a contracting party to an interpretation of Article XXVIII, paragraph 5, according to which a contracting party would be authorized to implement, without a waiver, notified withdrawals together with the compensatory offers before the negotiations were concluded and even without notification of the absence of their conclusion”.⁸⁸ In a later meeting of the same body it was also stressed “that a number of Article XXVIII negotiations had become rather protracted ... in some circumstances, it might be necessary to proceed with the implementation of tariff changes for domestic reasons, before negotiations had been formally concluded but it should not prevent the parties involved from continuing their efforts to reach an agreed settlement”.⁸⁹

See also the discussion under Article II and above at page 949 on the practice of requesting waivers of Article II when a contracting party wishes to implement changes in its tariff in advance of the conclusion of negotiations under Article XXVIII.

7. Note Ad Article XXVIII: “the greatest possible secrecy”

The Interpretative Note to Article XXVIII as a whole provides for “the greatest possible secrecy” in negotiations and consultations under the Article. The Report of the Review Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration” notes that “In recommending the inclusion of [the interpretative Note] concerning the preservation of secrecy in order to avoid the disclosure of prospective tariff changes, the Working Party took note

B. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ARTICLE XXVIII AND OTHER GATT PROVISIONS

1. Article II

See material on “maintenance of ‘treatment’ versus modification of a concession” under Article II.

2. Article XVIII:A

The present text of Article XVIII:7 (Section A of Article XVIII) was drafted during the Review Session in 1954-55 in the same Review Working Party on Schedules and Administration which drafted the present text of Article XXVIII. The proviso in Article XVIII:7 permitting the applicant contracting party to modify or withdraw concessions where it cannot, for good reasons, provide adequate compensation corresponds to Article XXVIII:4(d) including the right of other contracting parties to withdraw substantially equivalent concessions initially negotiated with that contracting party.⁹¹

3. Article XIX

In a number of instances, contracting parties which have suspended a concession under Article XIX have ceased to invoke Article XIX as a result of a modification or withdrawal of the concession under Article XXVIII. See the table of Article XIX actions following the chapter on Article XIX.

4. Article XXIII (including arbitration, conciliation and good offices)

See the references above at page 947 to the discussions in 1947 concerning the relationship between the basis and extent of action under Article XXVIII and the basis and extent of action under Article XXIII:2.

In 1974, when Article XXIV:6 negotiations between Canada and the European Communities did not produce a mutually satisfactory result, Canada referred the matter to the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 1(c) and 2 of Article XXIII and requested that a panel of experts be appointed to investigate whether the new Schedules LXXII and LXXIIbis maintained a general level of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions between Canada and the European Communities, not less favourable to trade than that provided for in Schedules XL, XLbis, XIX, XXII and LXI.⁹² The representative of the European Communities recalled “that the negotiations that had led to this new Schedule covered practically the whole of the customs tariffs in question and a difficult assessment of both a quantitative and qualitative character was therefore called for. The Community could not accept the proposal. The conciliation procedures of the GATT had hitherto mostly been used in cases of violations of the General Agreement; in the present case, a number of factors made this procedure inappropriate. Such an exercise would involve highly sophisticated assessments in complex trade fields where the criteria for reaching judgements were exceedingly imprecise”.⁹³ At the following Council meeting, the Chairman “concluded that it was the wish of the Council, with the exception of the European Communities, to establish such a panel and that he should, in due course, discuss the question of the panel in consultation with the parties most concerned”.⁹⁴ The two parties reached a bilateral agreement, referred to above at page 951.

The 1984 Report of the “Panel on Newsprint” (see page 945 above) includes the following findings:

“Taking all factors mentioned above into account, the Panel concluded that the EC, in unilaterally establishing for 1984 a duty-free quota of 500,000 tonnes, had not acted in conformity with their obligations under Article II of the GATT. The Panel shared the view expressed before it relating to the fundamental importance of the security and predictability of GATT tariff bindings, a principle which constitutes a central obligation in the system of the General Agreement.

“... the Panel found that the EC action constituted a prima facie case of nullification or impairment of benefits which Canada was entitled to expect from the General Agreement. ...

“On the basis of the findings and conclusions reached above, the Panel suggests that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend that the European Communities engage promptly in renegotiations under the procedures of Article XXVIII of the GATT with regard to the tariff quota on newsprint in Schedule LXXII. Further, the Panel suggests that the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommend to the European Communities that, pending the termination of such negotiations, the duty-free tariff quota of 1.5 million tonnes for m.f.n. suppliers be maintained.

“In the light of the suggested recommendations contained in paragraph 56 above, the Panel saw no need to express itself on the request by Canada that it be authorized to suspend the application of appropriate concessions or other obligations under the GATT”.⁹⁵

At the special meeting of the Council in October 1988 to review developments in the trading system, the Director-General informed the Council that in April 1988, Canada and the EC had asked him, with reference to paragraph 8 of the 1979 “Understanding regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance”,⁹⁶ to render an advisory opinion on whether a tariff concession granted by Portugal to Canada in 1961 was applicable to wet salted cod. This issue had arisen in tariff negotiations between Canada and the EC under Article XXIV:6. He had agreed on 15 April to render such an opinion and on 15 July had made it available to the two parties concerned.⁹⁷

The 1992 Report of the Members of the Reconvened Oilseeds Panel on “Follow-up on the Panel Report ‘EEC - Payments and Subsidies paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-Feed Proteins’” notes as follows:

“... the Panel found that benefits accruing to the United States under Article II of the General Agreement in respect of the zero tariff bindings for oilseeds in the Community Schedule of Concessions continued to be impaired as a result of the production subsidy scheme provided for in Regulation 3766/91 ...

“The Panel noted that over two years had passed since the Oilseeds Panel Report had been adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES. While the Community Regulations had been modified, the impairment of the tariff concessions had not been eliminated. Under these circumstances, the Panel can see no reason for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to continue to defer consideration of further action in relation to the impairment of the tariff concessions.

“The Panel therefore recommends that the Community should act expeditiously to eliminate the impairment of the tariff concessions -- either by modifying its new support system for oilseeds or by renegotiating its tariff concessions for oilseeds under Article XXVIII. In the event that the dispute is not resolved expeditiously in either of these ways, the CONTRACTING PARTIES should, if so requested by the United States, consider further action under Article XXIII:2 of the General Agreement”.⁹⁸

In June 1992 the EEC requested and was granted authorization to renegotiate its tariff concessions for oilseeds and oilcake under Article XXVIII:4 (see above at page 953). In August 1992, the EEC referred certain issues to the CONTRACTING PARTIES under Article XXVIII:4(c) and (d), including the following.

“How should the impact be estimated of the impairment of benefits of a tariff concession resulting from the subsequent grant of a subsidy with respect to the initial legitimate expectations of a contracting party that negotiated the concession?”

- “Should this impact be evaluated on the basis of changes in production, trade, consumption or the competitive relationship between domestic and imported products, or by a combination of all or some of these elements?”
- “Can countries which did not initially negotiate the concession be considered as ‘having a legitimate expectation’ with regard to subsidies granted subsequently to the negotiation?”
- “What can the ‘legitimate expectation’ with regard to a previously granted subsidy be in the case of a country which only subsequently acquires rights with respect to the concession (for example, in the case of accession to the GATT subsequent to the subsidy)?”
- “In the event of globalization of the six concessions, how will it be possible, where appropriate, to break down the impact of the various subsidies granted to each of the products concerned for the six tariff concessions?”⁹⁹

See also the material on non-violation nullification or impairment under Article XXIII. Consensus was not reached on a response to the EC request for the views of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. At the Forty-eighth Session in December 1992, the EC representative noted that thus far the CONTRACTING PARTIES had been unable to respond to the questions addressed by the EEC, and noted that negotiations between the Community and the United States had led to a compromise agreed ad referendum which would enable the Community to end its Article XXVIII:4 negotiations with the United States.¹⁰⁰

C. PROCEDURES FOR RENEGOTIATIONS AND FOR MODIFICATION AND RECTIFICATION OF SCHEDULES

Article XXVIII provides for three types of negotiations: (a) normal three-year (open season) renegotiations under paragraph 1; (b) renegotiations in special circumstances, after authorization by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, under paragraph 4; and (c) renegotiations following a reservation made under paragraph 5. In addition, Article XVIII:7 (the present text of which was drafted in parallel with the text of Article XXVIII:4) provides for renegotiation of concessions at any time by a contracting party coming within the scope of Article XVIII:4(a), and Article XXIV:6 provides for use of the procedures of Article XXVIII. Article XXVII also provides for consultation with substantial suppliers with respect to concessions withheld or withdrawn thereunder.

1. Procedures for negotiations under Article XXVIII

On 31 May 1957 the Executive Secretary, in compliance with instructions given to him by the CONTRACTING PARTIES¹⁰², issued a Note concerning arrangements for negotiations under Article XXVIII in 1957.¹⁰³ This note served as a procedural guideline for Article XXVIII negotiations until 1978.

In June and September 1978, the Director-General issued Notes with revised procedural guidelines for renegotiations under Article XXVIII.¹⁰⁴ These guidelines were replaced by Procedures for Negotiations under Article XXVIII¹⁰⁵, adopted by the Council on 10 November 1980 on the recommendation of the Committee on Tariff Concessions. All renegotiations under Article XXVIII are now being conducted under these Procedures, which provide as follows:

“1. A contracting party intending to negotiate for the modification or withdrawal of concessions in accordance with the procedures of Article XXVIII, paragraph 1 -- which are also applicable to negotiations under paragraph 5 of that Article -- should transmit a notification to that effect to the secretariat which will distribute the notification to all other contracting parties in a secret document.¹⁰⁶ In the case of negotiations under paragraph 4 of Article XXVIII the request for authority to enter into negotiations should be transmitted to the secretariat to be circulated in a secret document and included in the agenda of the next meeting of the Council.

“2. The notification or request should include a list of items, with corresponding tariff line numbers, which it is intended to modify or withdraw indicating for each item the contracting parties, if any, with which the item was initially negotiated. It should be indicated whether the intention is to modify a concession or withdraw it, in whole or in part, from the schedule. If a concession is to be modified, the proposed modification should be stated in the notification or circulated as soon as possible thereafter to those contracting parties with which the concession was originally negotiated and those which are recognized, in accordance with paragraph 4 below, to have a principal or a substantial supplying interest. The notification or request should be accompanied by statistics of imports of the products involved, by country of origin, for the last three years for which statistics are available. If specific or mixed duties are affected, both values and quantities should be indicated, if possible.

“3. At the same time as the notification is transmitted to the secretariat or when the authorization to enter into negotiations has been granted by the Council -- or as soon as possible thereafter -- the contracting party referred to in paragraph 1 above should communicate to those contracting parties, with which concessions were initially negotiated, and those which have a principal supplying interest, the compensatory adjustments which it is prepared to offer.

“4. Any contracting party which considers that it has a principal or a substantial supplying interest in a concession which is to be the subject of negotiation and consultation under Article XXVIII should communicate its claim in writing to the contracting party referred to in paragraph 1 above and at the same time inform the secretariat. If the contracting party referred to in paragraph 1 above recognizes the claim, the recognition will constitute a determination by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of interest in the sense of Article XXVIII:1.¹⁰⁷ If a claim of interest is not recognized, the contracting party making the claim may refer the matter to the Council. Claims of interest should be made within ninety days following the circulation of the import statistics referred to in paragraph 2 above.

“5. Upon completion of each bilateral negotiation the contracting party referred to in paragraph 1 above should send to the secretariat a joint letter on the lines of the model in Annex A attached hereto signed by both parties. To this letter shall be attached a report on the lines of the model in Annex B attached hereto. The report should be initialled by both parties. The secretariat will distribute the letter and the report to all contracting parties as a secret document.

“6. Upon completion of all the negotiations the contracting party referred to in paragraph 1 above should send to the secretariat, for distribution in a secret document, a final report on the lines of the model in Annex C attached hereto.

“7. Contracting parties will be free to give effect to the changes agreed upon in the negotiations as from the first day of the period referred to in Article XXVIII:1, or, in the case of negotiations under paragraph 4 or 5 of Article XXVIII, as from the date on which the conclusion of all the negotiations have been notified as set out in paragraph 6 above. A notification shall be submitted to the secretariat, for circulation to contracting parties, of the date on which these changes will come into force.

“8. Formal effect will be given to the changes in the schedules by means of Certifications in accordance with the Decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES of 26 March 1980.

“9. The secretariat will be available at all times to assist the governments involved in the negotiations and consultations.

“10. These procedures are in relevant parts also valid for renegotiations under Article XVIII, paragraph 7, and Article XXIV, paragraph 6.”¹⁰⁸

In discussion of these Procedures during the 3 November 1980 meeting of the Committee on Tariff Concessions, “the Chairman took up the question of the character of the document and recalled the comments made by the representative of Finland that the terms used in the text and particularly the word ‘should’ meant that the document should be interpreted as guidelines and that contracting parties entering into Article XXVIII negotiations were invited to follow those guidelines but should not consider them as binding obligations”.¹⁰⁹

2. Procedures for negotiations in connection with implementation of the Harmonized System

On 12 July 1983, the Council adopted a Decision on “GATT Concessions under the Harmonized Commodity Description and Coding System” setting out “basic principles” and “proposed special procedures” for renegotiations under Article XXVIII in order to facilitate the application of the Harmonized System with effect from 1 January 1987.

“3.2 The guidelines relating to procedures for negotiations under Article XXVIII ... will be the basis for this exercise. ... However, because of the amount and complexity of the work involved, and the exceptional nature of the exercise, it will be necessary to simplify the guidelines, as indicated below ...

“4.1 Each contracting party adopting the Harmonized System shall supply to the GATT secretariat the following information:

“4.1.1 An up-to-date consolidated schedule of concessions in the existing nomenclature in loose-leaf form.

“4.1.2 A proposed consolidated schedule of concessions in the nomenclature of the Harmonized System ...

“4.1.3 A concordance table from the existing to the proposed consolidated schedules of concessions ...

“4.1.4 A concordance table from the proposed to the existing consolidated schedules of concessions ...

“4.1.5 A list of items proposed for certification ...

“4.1.6 A list of items for renegotiation ...

¹⁰⁸C/113 and Corr.1, 27S/26-29. The Annexes are not reprinted in the BISD and can be found in C/113.

¹⁰⁹TAR/M/3, p. 9-10, para. 4.7.

“4.2 When contracting parties consider it unavoidable to combine headings or parts of headings in implementing the Harmonized System they may have to modify certain of their existing concessions. Possible ways of arriving at new rates include:

“4.2.1 Applying the lowest rate of any previous heading to the whole of the new heading.

“4.2.2 Applying the rate previously applied to the heading or headings with the majority of trade.

“4.2.3 Applying the trade weighted average rate of duty for the new heading.

“4.2.4 Applying the arithmetic average of the previous rates of duty, where no basis exists for establishing reasonably accurate trade allocations.

“4.3 If a contracting party considers that the conversion of a concession, which has been notified as a rectification case by another contracting party, in effect impairs the value of the concessions and should have been notified for renegotiation under Article XXVIII, the first contracting party, having demonstrated at least its substantial interest in the concession, is free to request, in accordance with normal practice in rectification exercises, that the concession be restored (or, failing, that the item concerned be notified for renegotiation).

“4.5 Consistent with Part IV of the GATT special account would be taken of the needs of developing countries.”¹¹⁰

Prior to the adoption of the Decision, it was stated “that, under this document, any contracting party was entitled to request the maintenance of particular tariff items of interest to it in the new nomenclature, whenever tariff lines with different bound rates were combined or whenever bound rates were combined with unbound rates. This understanding was in keeping with the basic principle stated in paragraph 2.1 [of the Decision,] namely that ‘existing GATT bindings should be maintained unchanged’”.¹¹¹

At the November 1986 Council meeting, the Forty-second Session and the December 1986 meeting of the Committee on Tariff Concessions, a number of contracting parties noted the difficulties experienced by their delegations in analysing documentation and submitting claims of interest within the time-limits proposed. Other contracting parties stressed the necessity of avoiding a further postponement of the entry into force of the Harmonized System, which had been deferred from 1 January 1987 to 1 January 1988 due to lack of completion of the associated Article XXVIII negotiations. The 1987 Report of the Committee notes that “the Committee recognized that it was necessary to extend the time-limits for the submission of specific claims of interest related to the transposition of national schedules of tariff concessions into the Harmonized System”.¹¹²

3. Procedures for rectification and modification of Schedules of concessions

Procedures for Modification and Rectification of Schedules of Tariff Concessions were adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 17 November 1959¹¹⁵, 19 November 1968¹¹⁶, and 26 March 1980.¹¹⁷ Paragraph 1 of the Decision of 26 March 1980 provides that “Changes in the authentic texts of Schedules annexed to the General Agreement which reflect modifications resulting from action under Article II, Article XVIII, Article XXIV,

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

Concerning the preparatory work associated with the schedule provisions of the General Agreement, and the relationship between the Havana Charter and Schedules under the General Agreement, see generally Section III under Article II. Since the Charter did not directly provide for schedules of concessions, it also did not provide for the renegotiation of concessions nor for modification of schedules. The text of Article XXVIII emerged from discussions of the Tariff Agreement Committee and a draft by an ad-hoc sub-committee, during September and October 1947 at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee.¹¹⁸

The text of Article XXVIII of the General Agreement as agreed 30 October 1947 provided that concessions could be renegotiated only after 1 January 1951; moreover, Article XXXI did not permit withdrawal prior to 1 January 1951. The sole general "escape clause" from the general obligation to maintain tariff concessions was Article XIX. During the negotiation of the text at Geneva one delegate summarized the legal situation as: "the obligation that we are accepting here in respect of a tariff item is initially to bind the item at the rates set out in the Schedule for three years ...".¹¹⁹ Paragraph 1 of Article XXVIII provided for renegotiation after 1 January 1951 "by negotiation and agreement" with INR holders and "subject to consultation with such other contracting parties as the CONTRACTING PARTIES determine to have a substantial interest in such treatment".

By a Resolution of 1 April 1950, the CONTRACTING PARTIES recommended prolongation of the assured life of the schedules negotiated at Geneva in 1947 and Annecy in 1949.¹²⁰ One year later, paragraph 6(a) of the Torquay Protocol of 21 April 1951 amended the date in paragraph 1 to substitute "January 1, 1954" for "January 1, 1951".¹²¹ and in a Declaration the CONTRACTING PARTIES agreed that "they will not invoke prior to 1 January 1954, the provisions of Article XXVIII, paragraph 1, of the General Agreement to modify or cease to apply the treatment which they have agreed to accord under Article II of the General Agreement to any product described in the appropriate schedule annexed to the General Agreement".¹²² A similar Declaration on 24 October 1953 extended this date to 1 July 1955.¹²³

Renegotiations did nevertheless take place, under waiver or under the "sympathetic consideration" procedure discussed below, even prior to 1 January 1951. The situation was summarized by the report of the Working Party in the Eighth Session on "Continued Application of Schedules Annexed to the Agreement", which drafted the 1953 Declaration:

"A contracting party which wishes to renegotiate an item in its schedule in order to afford protection for developmental purposes can have recourse to Article XVIII. In appropriate circumstances, contracting parties can also have recourse to other provisions of the General Agreement. Apart from the cases specifically provided for, the provisions of the General Agreement for the modification or withdrawal of tariff rates which are bound in the schedules would not operate, if the assured life of the schedules is extended as proposed, until 1 July 1955. The Working Party noted, however, that during the first and second periods of assured validity of the schedules, some contracting parties had felt the need, in exceptional circumstances, to modify certain bound rates of duty and have sought authority from the CONTRACTING PARTIES to enter into negotiations to this end. All such requests have been examined with sympathy and understanding and the CONTRACTING PARTIES have authorized the renegotiations. ...

“There is no reason to believe that contracting parties will be less ready in the future than they have been in the past to consider requests of this kind and to join in granting authority for the necessary negotiations, and the approval of this report would in itself be confirmation that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would give sympathetic consideration to such requests”.¹²⁴

The Intersessional Committee was given the authority to examine and authorize such requests for “sympathetic consideration”.¹²⁵

In the 1954-55 Review Session, Article XXVIII was extensively revised. Paragraph 4 was added, replacing the “sympathetic consideration” procedure; other additions included the provisions on rights for “principal suppliers”, paragraph 5, and the Interpretative Notes (originally negotiated as “regulations” for the use of Article XXVIII). These modifications came into effect on 7 October 1957 through entry into force of the Protocol Amending Parts II and III of the General Agreement.¹²⁶

B. INVOCATION OF ARTICLE XXVIII:5 SINCE 1958: STATUS AS OF 1995

NOTE: This table records invocations of Article XXVIII:5, permitted once each three years (most recently as of 1 January 1994). By invoking Article XXVIII:5 a contracting party reserves its rights for a three-year period with regard to its entire Schedule. In many cases no renegotiations have taken place even though such a reservation was made.

C. RENEGOTIATIONS UNDER ARTICLE XXVIII:1General notes:

1. In addition to notifications listed below, Article XXVIII negotiations have been carried out with respect to several Schedules under the special and simplified procedures adopted by the Council on 12 July 1983 (30S/17) in connection with the transposition of Schedules into the Harmonized System (SECRET/HS document series).
2. Australia, Benelux, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Denmark, France, Haiti, Italy, New Zealand, South Africa, United Kingdom and Uruguay carried out renegotiations under Article XXVIII:1 in 1950 but detailed information is not available.
3. Renegotiations under Article XXVIII in certain particular cases where the paragraph of Article XXVIII was not specified have been listed under Article XXVIII:1.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXVIII bis AND OF INTERPRETATIVE NOTE AD ARTICLE XXVIII bis

Article XXVIII bis

Tariff Negotiations

1. The contracting parties recognize that customs duties often constitute serious obstacles to trade; thus negotiations on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis, directed to the substantial reduction of the general level of tariffs and other charges on imports and exports and in particular to the reduction of such high tariffs as discourage the importation even of minimum quantities, and conducted with due regard to the objectives of this Agreement and the varying needs of individual contracting parties, are of great importance to the expansion of international trade. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may therefore sponsor such negotiations from time to time.

2. (a) Negotiations under this Article may be carried out on a selective product-by-product basis or by the application of such multilateral procedures as may be accepted by the contracting parties concerned. Such negotiations may be directed towards the reduction of duties, the binding of duties at then existing levels or undertakings that individual duties or the average duties on specified categories of products shall not exceed specified levels. The binding against increase of low duties or of duty-free treatment shall, in principle, be recognized as a concession equivalent in value to the reduction of high duties.

(b) The contracting parties recognize that in general the success of multilateral negotiations would depend on the participation of all contracting parties which conduct a substantial proportion of their external trade with one another.

3. Negotiations shall be conducted on a basis which affords adequate opportunity to take into account:

(a) the needs of individual contracting parties and individual industries;

(b) the needs of less-developed countries for a more flexible use of tariff protection to assist their economic development and the special needs of these countries to maintain tariffs for revenue purposes; and

- (c) all other relevant circumstances, including the fiscal*, developmental, strategic and other needs of the contracting parties concerned.

Interpretative Note Ad Article XXVIII bis from Annex I

Paragraph 3

It is understood that the reference to fiscal needs would include the revenue aspect of duties and particularly duties imposed primarily for revenue purposes, or duties imposed on products which can be substituted for products subject to revenue duties to prevent the avoidance of such duties.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXVIII BIS

B. GENERAL

Since 1947, seven “rounds” of multilateral tariff and trade negotiations have been completed within GATT: in 1947 (in Geneva), 1949 (Annecy, France), 1951 (Torquay, England), 1956 (Geneva), 1960-1961 (Geneva, the “Dillon Round”), 1964-1967 (Geneva, the “Kennedy Round”), and 1973-1979 (Geneva, the “Tokyo Round”). The eighth round of multilateral negotiations, the Uruguay Round, was launched in Punta del Este, Uruguay in September 1986 and was concluded with the Final Act signed at Marrakesh, Morocco on 15 April 1994.

Article XXVIII bis was added to the General Agreement as a result of agreements reached during the Review Session of 1954-55 in the Review Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration”. The Report of that Working Party notes that “The article would impose no new obligations on contracting parties. Each contracting party would retain the right to decide whether or not to engage in negotiations or to participate in a tariff conference”.¹ A 1985 Note by the Secretariat on “The Launching of Trade Negotiations” states:

“The General Agreement does not lay down any special procedures for the launching of negotiations nor any rules for their organization. Under Article XXV:1 the CONTRACTING PARTIES have the general power to take joint action ‘with a view ... to furthering the objectives of the (General) Agreement’, and under Article XXVIII bis:1 they are authorized to sponsor tariff negotiations’.”²

B. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXVIII BIS

1. Paragraph 1: “negotiations on a reciprocal and mutually advantageous basis”

(1) Measurement of value of concessions

The Report of the Review Session Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration” records that in response to a proposal of Brazil, which wished to establish certain rules for tariff negotiations and, in particular, for the measurement of concessions:

“... The Working Party considered that governments participating in negotiations should retain complete freedom to adopt any method they might feel most appropriate for estimating the value of duty reductions and bindings. ... The Working Party noted that there was nothing in the Agreement, or in the rules for tariff negotiations which had been used in the past, to prevent governments from adopting any formula they might choose, and therefore considered that there was no need for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to make any recommendation in this matter”.³

³L/329, adopted on 26 February 1955, 3S/205, 219-220, para. 38.

The 1959 Second Report on “Tariff Reduction” of Committee I, which drew up the rules and procedures for the 1960-61 Dillon Round, notes that

“The Committee examined the proposal that the CONTRACTING PARTIES lay down rules for the evaluation of concessions based on the relative importance of a commodity in the exporting country, rather than its relative importance to the trade of the importing country. This proposal could not be accepted in view of the traditional attitude of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, reaffirmed at the review session (BISD, Third Supplement, page 219, paragraph 38) that governments participating in negotiations should retain complete freedom to adopt any method they might feel most appropriate for estimating the value of duty reductions and bindings”.⁴

(2) Reciprocity as regards developing countries

A Note by the Executive Secretary on “Participation of Less-Developed Countries in Trade Negotiations”, annexed to the March 1961 Report of Committee III, recalls statements in the Reports of Committee I that

“The principle underlying GATT tariff negotiations is the exchange of reciprocal and mutually advantageous concessions. This does not mean, however, that less-developed countries would always be held to strict reciprocity ... Less-developed countries should also bear in mind that concessions which they grant under the GATT are firm only for short periods, generally for three years, and that Article XXVIII gives them the right, at the end of those periods, to modify or withdraw concessions which might conflict with their development plans. Furthermore, the provisions of Article XVIII give them the possibility of re-negotiating concessions at any time, when such action is necessary for development purposes, and a special procedure has been provided to expedite such re-negotiations”.⁵

In the Conclusions of the Meeting of Ministers adopted on 30 November 1961

“the Ministers agreed that, in view of the stage of economic development of the less-developed countries, a more flexible attitude should be taken with respect to the degree of reciprocity to be expected from these countries”.⁶

The Ministerial Resolution of 21 May 1963, which inaugurated the Kennedy Round, provided

“That in the trade negotiations every effort shall be made to reduce barriers to exports of the less developed countries but that the developed countries cannot expect to receive reciprocity from the less developed countries”.⁷

See also Article XXXVI:8 and the Interpretative Note relating to that paragraph, which became effective on 27 June 1966.

The Declaration of Ministers, approved at Tokyo on 14 September 1973, inaugurating the Tokyo Round provides, inter alia:

“The developed countries do not expect reciprocity for commitments made by them in the negotiations to reduce or remove tariff and other barriers to the trade of developing countries, i.e., the developed countries do not expect the developing countries, in the course of the trade negotiations, to make contributions which are inconsistent with their individual development, financial and trade needs. The Ministers recognize the need for special measures to be taken in the negotiations to assist the developing countries in their efforts to increase their export earnings and promote their economic development and, where appropriate, for priority attention to be given to products or areas of interest to developing countries. They also recognize the importance of maintaining and improving the Generalized System of Preferences. They further recognize the importance of the application of differential measures to developing countries in ways which will provide special and more favourable treatment for them in areas of the negotiations where this is feasible and appropriate.

“The Ministers recognize that the particular situations and problems of the least developed among the developing countries shall be given special attention, and stress the need to ensure that these countries receive special treatment in the context of any general or specific measures taken in favour of the developing countries during the negotiations”.⁸

The Decision on “Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries” which was negotiated in the Tokyo Round and adopted on 28 November 1979 provides, inter alia:

“The developed countries do not expect reciprocity for commitments made by them in trade negotiations to reduce or remove tariffs and other barriers to the trade of developing countries, i.e., the developed countries do not expect the developing countries, in the course of trade negotiations, to make contributions which are inconsistent with their individual development, financial and trade needs. Developed contracting parties shall therefore not seek, neither shall less-developed contracting parties be required to make, concessions that are inconsistent with the latter’s development, financial and trade needs... Having regard to the special economic difficulties and the particular development, financial and trade needs of the least-developed countries, the developed countries shall exercise the utmost restraint in seeking any concessions or contributions for commitments made by them to reduce or remove tariffs and other barriers to the trade of such countries, and the least-developed countries shall not be expected to make concessions or contributions that are inconsistent with the recognition of their particular situation and problems”.⁹

The Ministerial Declaration on the Uruguay Round, agreed at Punta del Este on 20 September 1986, launching the Uruguay Round, provides, inter alia:

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES agree that the principle of differential and more favourable treatment embodied in Part IV and other relevant provisions of the General Agreement and in the decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES of 28 November 1979 on Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries applies to the negotiations. In the implementation of standstill and rollback, particular care should be given to avoiding disruptive effects on the trade of less-developed contracting parties.

“The developed countries do not expect reciprocity for commitments made by them in trade negotiations to reduce or remove tariffs and other barriers to the trade of developing countries, i.e. the developed countries do not expect the developing countries, in the course of trade negotiations, to make contributions which are inconsistent with their industrial development, financial and trade needs. Developed contracting parties shall therefore not seek, neither shall less-developed contracting parties be required to make, concessions that are inconsistent with the latter’s development, financial and trade needs.

“Less-developed contracting parties expect that their capacity to make contributions or negotiated concessions or take other mutually agreed action under the provisions and procedures of the General Agreement would improve with the progressive development of their economies and improvement in their trade situation and they would accordingly expect to participate more fully in the framework of rights and obligations under the General Agreement.

“Special attention shall be given to the particular situation and problems of the least-developed countries and to the need to encourage positive measures to facilitate expansion of their trading opportunities. Expeditious implementation of the relevant provisions of the 1982 Ministerial Declaration concerning the least-developed countries shall also be given appropriate attention”.¹⁰

(3) Negotiations on matters other than tariffs

The procedures for the tariff negotiations held in Geneva in 1947 in connection with the negotiation of the General Agreement provided that “The various observations in this report regarding the negotiations of tariffs and tariff preferences should be read as applying (mutatis mutandis) to the negotiation of state-trading margins under Article 31 of the Charter”.¹¹ The procedures adopted for the negotiations in Annecy and Torquay each stated that:

“The Havana Charter provides that, in addition to customs tariffs and other charges on imports and exports, certain regulations, quotas, protection afforded through the operation of import and export monopolies, etc., shall be subject to negotiation in the manner provided in Article 17. The relevant provisions are provided in Articles 16 (including the Annexes thereto), 18, 19 and 31 [corresponding to GATT Articles I, III, IV, XVII and Annexes A through G]. Accordingly, requests may be submitted for concessions in respect of matters covered by these provisions in the same way as requests for tariff concessions”.¹²

The Rules and Procedures for the Geneva tariff conference of 1956 provided that “In addition to customs tariffs and other charges on imports, certain regulations, protection afforded through the operation of import monopolies, etc., as provided in Articles [I, II, III and IV] shall be subject to negotiation in accordance with these rules. Accordingly, requests may be submitted for concessions in respect of these matters in the same way as requests for tariff concessions”.¹³

The Rules and Procedures for the Dillon Round provided that participants could enter into negotiations in accordance with these rules in respect of not just tariffs but also the following matters: the protection afforded through the operation of import monopolies, as provided in Articles II and XVII (including the interpretative notes thereto); internal quantitative regulations as provided in paragraph 6 of Article III (mixing regulations); the level of screen quotas as provided in Article IV; import restrictions as provided in paragraph 2(c) of Article XI; the level of a subsidy which operates directly or indirectly to reduce imports; and internal taxes.¹⁴

The Ministerial Resolution of 21 May 1963 on “Arrangements for the Reduction or Elimination of Tariffs and other Barriers to Trade, and Related Matters” which launched the Kennedy Round included a provision that “the trade negotiations will deal not only with tariffs but also with non-tariff barriers.”¹⁵ During the Kennedy Round agreement was reached inter alia on the 1967 Agreement on Implementation of Article VI, and the Agreement Relating Principally to Chemicals.¹⁶

The Tokyo Ministerial Declaration of 14 September 1973, which launched the Tokyo Round, provided that “the negotiations should aim, inter alia, to: ...reduce or eliminate non-tariff measures or, where this is not appropriate, to reduce or eliminate their trade restricting or distorting effects, and to bring such measures under more effective discipline”.¹⁷ During the Tokyo Round, discussions took place both on rules regarding non-tariff barriers and on “non-tariff measures not dealt with multilaterally”. The former negotiations resulted in nine agreements: the 1979 Agreement on Implementation of Article VI, the Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII, the Agreement on Implementation of Article VII, the Agreement on Import Licensing Procedures, the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade, the Agreement on Government Procurement, the Agreement on Trade in Civil Aircraft, the Arrangement Regarding Bovine Meat, and the International Dairy Arrangement.¹⁸ In the “Action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the Multilateral Trade Negotiations” of 28 November 1979, the CONTRACTING PARTIES note “that as a result of the Multilateral Trade

It was further agreed that “the inclusion of internal taxes in the negotiating rules would be subject to the understanding in the Interpretative Note to Article 17 of the Havana Charter” (ibid., 8S/111, para. 16(v)). The Interpretative Note to Charter Article 17 provided that “An internal tax (other than a general tax uniformly applicable to a considerable number of products) which is applied to a product not produced domestically in substantial quantities shall be treated as a customs duty under Article 17 in any case in which a tariff concession on the product would not be of substantial value unless accompanied by a binding or a reduction of the tax”.

Negotiations, a number of Agreements... have been drawn up. They further note that these Agreements will go into effect as between their parties... The CONTRACTING PARTIES also note that existing rights and benefits under the General Agreement of contracting parties not being parties to these Agreements, including those derived from Article I, are not affected by these Agreements".¹⁹

The Uruguay Round Declaration of 1986 provided that "Negotiations shall aim to reduce or eliminate non-tariff measures, including quantitative restrictions..." and that "Negotiations shall aim to improve, clarify, or expand, as appropriate, Agreements or Arrangements negotiated in the Tokyo Round of Multilateral Negotiations".²⁰ The negotiations resulted in conclusion of twelve agreements: the Agreement on Agriculture, the Agreement on the Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures, the Agreement on Textiles and Clothing, the 1994 Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade, the 1994 Agreement on Implementation of Article VI, the 1994 Agreement on Implementation of Article VII, the Agreement on Preshipment Inspection, the Agreement on Rules of Origin, the Agreement on Import Licensing Procedures, the Agreement on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures, and the Agreement on Safeguards. In addition, the Schedules of concessions on market access for goods include a new Part III for any concessions regarding non-tariff measures, as well as a new Part IV for commitments limiting domestic support and export subsidies on agricultural products covered by the Agreement on Agriculture.

(1) "negotiations ... on a selective product-by-product basis"

Express provisions for "selective product-by-product" negotiations on a request/offer basis were included in Article 17 of the Havana Charter, the procedures for the 1947 Geneva tariff negotiations, the negotiations in 1949 in Annecy, in 1951 at Torquay, and in 1956 in Geneva, and the 1960-1961 "Dillon Round".²¹ For example, the request-offer process in the Dillon Round of 1960-1961 proceeded as follows: in the first stage delegations presented request lists to the countries with which they wished to negotiate, and in the second stage delegations submitted consolidated offer lists. In the next stage countries gradually defined their positions in a series of bilateral meetings and finally struck a bilateral balance with each of their negotiating partners. In addition, participants negotiated for reciprocity from other countries which would benefit from the concessions which had been negotiated bilaterally, as the rules provided that "participating governments will be expected to take into account the indirect benefits which they will receive from the negotiations between other governments".²²

(2) "or by the application of such multilateral procedures as may be accepted by the contracting parties concerned": Procedures adopted for negotiating rounds in the GATT

The Report of the Review Session Working Party on "Schedules and Customs Administration", which drafted Article XXVIII bis, notes that

"Several delegations proposed to include in the new article certain rules for negotiations such as those in Article 17 of the Havana Charter, but others thought it was not necessary to burden the article with a set of rules since it is not its purpose either to prescribe or to exclude any of the rules that have been followed in the past; the article imposes no obligations, and therefore should contain nothing that is mandatory. Further, since the article clearly envisages the possibility of tariff negotiations in which some contracting parties might not be able to participate, it would be unwise to prejudge the form which these negotiations should take by prescribing procedures and rules. The procedures for holding any particular trade negotiations will have to be determined at the time the holding of the negotiations is under consideration and contracting parties will then have ample opportunity to advocate the procedures under which they would be prepared to negotiate. A contracting party that is not satisfied with the procedures adopted, would be free not to participate in the negotiations".²³

(3) "The binding against increase of low duties or of duty-free treatment shall, in principle, be recognized as a concession equivalent in value to the reduction of high duties"

This sentence is taken from paragraph 2(d) of Article 17 of the Havana Charter. Similar statements appear in the procedures for the Geneva (1947), Annecy (1949) and Torquay (1950) trade negotiations.²⁵ The Report of the Review Session Working Party on "Schedules and Customs Administration," which drafted Article XXVIII bis, notes that

"The delegations of certain low-tariff countries were anxious to provide in the Agreement for certain principles to govern the tariff policy of the contracting parties in order to arrive at a better balance between the positions of the various contracting parties in this respect. While there was considerable sympathy ... it was considered inappropriate to expect contracting parties to accept any general form of commitment which would prejudice their freedom of action with respect to unbound tariffs. It was recognized, however, that in pursuit of its policies affecting international economic relations, including its tariff policy, each contracting party would have regard to the objectives of the Agreement and try to avoid unnecessary damage to the interests of other contracting parties".²⁶

²⁶L/329, adopted 26 February 1955, 3S/205, 218-219, para. 35. The Review Session agreed to amend the General Agreement so as to include a new Article I on "Objectives", which would contain the text of the former Preamble; see Sec/152/54, W.9/197, 3S/240 para. 25 and the chapter in this book on the Preamble.

The Rules and Procedures for the 1956 tariff conference held in Geneva note with respect to “the binding against increase of low duties” that “This rule takes account, inter alia, of the position of countries which, whilst maintaining low or moderate duties on all or most of the products imported from their principal suppliers, find their exports or potential exports generally impeded by high rates of duty”.²⁷

(4) Tariff negotiating rules, the “principal supplier rule”, and the use of formulas

Rounds of tariff negotiations before the Kennedy Round provided for the use of the “principal supplier rule”, which typically stated that “Participating countries may request concessions on products of which they individually, or collectively, are the principal suppliers to the countries from which the concessions are asked. This rule shall not apply to prevent a country not a principal supplier from making a request, but the country concerned may invoke the principal supplier rule if the principal supplier of the product is not participating in the negotiations or is not a contracting party to the General Agreement”.²⁸

However, the use of general tariff-cutting formulas was debated since the earliest years of the GATT, as a means of reducing disparities in tariffs.²⁹ The first linear tariff offer was by the EEC in the Dillon Round.³⁰ In the Ministerial Conclusions adopted on 30 November 1961 during the Dillon Round, at the Nineteenth Session,

“The Ministers agreed that the reduction of tariff barriers on a most-favoured-nation basis in accordance with the terms of the General Agreement should be continued. They recognized, however, that while the traditional GATT techniques for tariff negotiations on a commodity-by-commodity and country-by-country basis had produced substantial results, both in the past and during the present tariff conference, they were no longer adequate to meet the changing conditions of world trade. Consideration should, therefore, be given to the adoption of new techniques, in particular some form of linear tariff reduction. The Ministers agreed to request the CONTRACTING PARTIES to establish machinery to examine this question in the light of the views and proposals put forward during the Ministers’ discussions”.³¹

The 1963 Report of the subsequently established Working Party on Procedures for Tariff Reductions recorded agreement on some basic principles.³² In the Resolution of 21 May 1963 on “Arrangements for the Reduction or Elimination of Tariffs and other Barriers to Trade, and Related Matters,” which launched the Kennedy Round, the Ministers agreed, inter alia on the principle

“That, in view of the limited results obtained in recent years from item-by-item negotiations, the tariff negotiations ... shall be based upon a plan of substantial linear tariff reductions with a bare minimum of exceptions which shall be subject to confrontation and justification. The linear reductions shall be equal. In those cases where there are significant disparities in tariff levels, the tariff reductions will be based upon special rules of general and automatic application”.³³

A Resolution of 6 May 1964 adopted by the Trade Negotiations Committee meeting at Ministerial Level noted that “The rate of 50 per cent has been agreed as a working hypothesis for the determination of the general rate of linear reduction ... The ultimate agreement on tariff reductions in accordance with the application of this hypothesis is linked with the solution of other problems arising in the negotiations, for example, tariff disparities, agricultural problems, exceptions and non-tariff problems, and, in general, with the achievement of reciprocity...".³⁴ It was necessary to specify the rates to which this hypothesis would apply and it was therefore agreed that participants would notify the base date, the base level of duties and (since the linear cut only applied to industrial products) which products would be excluded. A number of exceptions to the rule were made.³⁵

The Tokyo Ministerial Declaration of 14 September 1973, which launched the Tokyo Round negotiations, stated that "negotiations should aim, inter alia, to ... conduct negotiations on tariffs by employment of appropriate formulae of as general application as possible...".³⁶ In advance of the Round, the Committee on Trade in Industrial Products discussed tariff elimination in industrial products, linear tariff reduction, and tariff harmonization.³⁷ A tariff harmonization formula was later accepted and used by most developed countries in their offers.³⁸

The Ministerial Declaration on the Uruguay Round of 20 September 1986 does not refer to the use of formulas, and instead provides that "Negotiations shall aim, by appropriate methods, to reduce or, as appropriate, eliminate tariffs including the reduction or elimination of high tariffs and tariff escalation. Emphasis shall be given to the expansion of the scope of tariff concessions among all participants".³⁹

See also under Article XXVIII concerning initial negotiating rights and the decisions on floating initial negotiating rights taken in connection with tariff reductions achieved through the formula approach.

(5) Joint negotiations by more than one contracting party

The Second Report of Committee I concerning preparations for the Dillon Round notes as follows: "With respect to the proposal that contracting parties be allowed to negotiate jointly on products of common concern the Committee agreed that the traditional rule in this matter, which has been maintained in the rules annexed hereto... was designed to permit this type of negotiation. ... Moreover there were examples of joint negotiation in the history of GATT tariff conferences".⁴⁰

A Note by the Executive Secretary on "Participation of Less-Developed Countries in Trade Negotiations" annexed to the March 1961 Report of Committee III recalls the statements in the Reports of Committee I that

"there are a number of ways in which less-developed countries may participate in tariff negotiations with a view to securing meaningful concessions. For example, a country which is not a meaningful supplier of a commodity would not be excluded from making a request for concessions on that commodity on the grounds that it is not the principal supplier. In such cases it would join forces with other suppliers and take part in multilateral negotiations with the importing country and this group could be considered as the 'principal supplier' and obtain a concession which could be matched by a joint offer on the part of the group. It should also be borne in mind that the 'principal supplier rule' is applied by most importing countries with some elasticity. Secondary suppliers have joined in tariff negotiations either in cases where the principal supplier was not prepared to make a request or where the secondary suppliers wished to obtain a better concession than the one which the principal supplier accepted. Moreover, the Tariff Negotiations Committee, in 1956, was instructed to place itself at the disposal of any country or group of countries to arrange for negotiations on a triangular or multilateral basis. It was thus possible for secondary suppliers to improve the scope of concessions".⁴¹

III. PREPARATORY WORK

The various drafts of the ITO Charter all included an Article on trade negotiations, which imposed an obligation for each Member of the ITO to enter into and carry out negotiations directed to substantial reduction of tariffs, other duties and charges, and preferences. This article also provided rules regarding, inter alia, the basis for negotiations and the application of negotiated reductions to reductions in margins of preference. This Article was not included in the New York Draft of the General Agreement nor in the General Agreement agreed in 1947. See above concerning the negotiating rules that were drafted and used for the round of trade negotiations held in Geneva in 1947 in conjunction with the negotiation of the General Agreement. Article 17 of the Charter on “Reduction of Tariffs and Elimination of Preferences” obligated each ITO Member to negotiate on request concerning reduction of tariffs, other charges and preferences; paragraph 3 provided that the Geneva negotiations of 1947 would be deemed to be negotiations under Article 17.

The present Article XXVIII bis was added in the Review Session of 1954-55. A Progress Report in 1954 by the Chairman of Review Working Party II on Tariffs, Schedules and Customs Administration notes that proposals submitted for the Review Session had suggested that an article similar to Article 17 be included in the General Agreement; that the General Agreement should include an undertaking to reduce customs duties deemed to be an obstacle to the development of trade; or that the CONTRACTING PARTIES endeavour to reach an understanding on collective automatic reduction and equalization of tariffs. It further notes the proposal that “a compromise solution might be found by inserting an article in which the obligation to negotiate would be recommendatory rather than mandatory and which would underline the principle of mutual advantage, reciprocity, etc.”.⁴²

The Report of the Review Working Party on “Schedules and Customs Administration,” which drafted Article XXVIII bis, introduces the discussion of this provision by noting that “The Working Party has examined the proposals for tariff reduction submitted by its Chairman, which were the result of discussions on the proposals submitted by the Benelux, German and Scandinavian delegations, and has decided to recommend the insertion of a new article in the General Agreement, dealing with tariff negotiations sponsored by the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.⁴³

The insertion of Article XXVIII bis was effected by the 1955 Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, which entered into force on 7 October 1957. This Article would have become Article XXIX if the 1955 Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX had entered into force.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXIX AND INTERPRETATIVE NOTE AD ARTICLE XXIX

Article XXIX

The Relation of this Agreement to the Havana Charter

1. The contracting parties undertake to observe to the fullest extent of their executive authority the general principles of Chapters I to VI inclusive and of Chapter IX of the Havana Charter pending their acceptance of it in accordance with their constitutional procedures.*

2. Part II of this Agreement shall be suspended on the day on which the Havana Charter enters into force.

3. If by September 30, 1949, the Havana Charter has not entered into force, the contracting parties shall meet before December 31, 1949, to agree whether this Agreement shall be amended, supplemented or maintained.

4. If at any time the Havana Charter should cease to be in force, the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall meet as soon as practicable thereafter to agree whether this Agreement shall be supplemented, amended or maintained. Pending such agreement, Part II of this Agreement shall again enter into force; Provided that the provisions of Part II other than Article XXIII shall be replaced, mutatis mutandis, in the form in which they then appeared in the Havana Charter; and Provided further that no contracting party shall be bound by any provisions which did not bind it at the time when the Havana Charter ceased to be in force.

5. If any contracting party has not accepted the Havana Charter by the date upon which it enters into force, the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall confer to agree whether, and if so in what way, this Agreement in so far as it affects relations between such contracting party and other contracting parties, shall be supplemented or amended. Pending such agreement the provisions of Part II of this Agreement shall, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 2 of this Article, continue to apply as between such contracting party and other contracting parties.

6. Contracting parties which are Members of the International Trade Organization shall not invoke the provisions of this Agreement so as to prevent the operation of any provision of the Havana Charter. The application of the principle underlying this paragraph to any contracting party which is not a Member of the International Trade Organization shall be the subject of an agreement pursuant to paragraph 5 of this Article.

Interpretative Note Ad Article XXIX from Annex I

Paragraph 1

Chapters VII and VIII of the Havana Charter have been excluded from paragraph 1 because they generally deal with the organization, functions and procedures of the International Trade Organization.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXIX

The General Agreement was drafted during the intermediate stages of the negotiation of the ITO Charter. The General Agreement was intended to serve as a framework for tariff concessions negotiated in the first round in 1947, and was intended to continue in existence even after the entry into force of the ITO Charter. The function of Article XXIX was twofold: it determined the relationship between the Charter and the General Agreement, and it provided that after the final version of the rules in Part II of the General Agreement had been negotiated during the Havana Conference, and after the Havana Charter had entered into effect, this version would automatically supersede Part II of the General Agreement. However, the Havana Charter never entered into force.

The present text of Article XXIX dates from the Second Session which met in September 1948 after the Havana Conference. It was drafted by the Working Party on Modifications to the General Agreement, which also considered proposals to amend the General Agreement so that its text would immediately reflect the corresponding articles of the Havana Charter.

See also the material in Section III below on the origins of paragraph 1.

(1) “the general principles of Chapters I-VI inclusive and of Chapter IX of the Havana Charter”

Chapters I through VI of the Charter dealt with, respectively, Purpose and Objectives, Employment and Economic Activity, Economic Development and Reconstruction, Commercial Policy, Restrictive Business Practices, and Inter-governmental Commodity Agreements. Chapter IX included General Provisions (final provisions).

When Article XXIX was redrafted at the Second Session, Chapters VII and VIII of the Havana Charter, which dealt with the International Trade Organization and Settlement of Differences, were omitted from the reference in Article XXIX “because they generally deal with the organization, functions and procedures of the International Trade Organization”.¹ It was stated then that “by virtue of the Final Act signed at Havana, the contracting parties must regard themselves morally bound not to go back on the principles evolved at Havana. The principle of giving due regard to the economic circumstances mentioned in paragraph 2 of Article 72, as well as those in other articles of the Havana Charter, could not be disregarded even though they were not explicitly included in paragraph 1 of Article XXIX”.²

(2) Article XXIX:1 and interpretation of the General Agreement in the light of the Havana Charter

The Second Session Working Party on Modifications to the General Agreement took a generally conservative approach to amendment of the General Agreement in advance of the anticipated supersession of Part II under Article XXIX:2. In explaining this decision, the Working Party’s report notes that “... if difficulties in application were to arise before the entry into force of the Charter, the CONTRACTING PARTIES would still have the possibility under the terms of Article XXV to settle such cases in the light of the provisions of Article XXIX, paragraph 1”.³ While declining a proposal to insert Articles 26, 27 and 28 of the Havana Charter (relating to subsidies) into the General Agreement, the Working Party noted that:

²GATT/CP.2/SR.18, p. 2.

³GATT/CP.2/22/Rev.1, adopted on 1 and 2 September 1948, II/39, 40. para. 9.

“... It was of course understood that, in the light of Article XXIX, paragraph 1, the CONTRACTING PARTIES undertake to apply the principles of the Havana Charter relating to export subsidies to the full extent of their executive authority”.⁴

Again declining a proposal to insert the interpretative note to Article 33:1 of the Havana Charter on transit into the General Agreement, the Working Party concluded “that such insertion was not necessary, since the text of Article 33, paragraph 1, of the Charter tallied with that of Article V, paragraph 1, of the General Agreement, and the CONTRACTING PARTIES, who all signed the Final Act of the Conference of Havana, could not interpret these provisions in any way other than that laid down in the Note ad Article 33 of the Charter. The representative of Pakistan appreciated the justice of this conclusion and agreed to withdraw his proposal on the understanding that the working party would record this statement in its report”.⁵

Many Panel Reports adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES have taken account of the drafting history and provisions of the Havana Charter in interpreting corresponding GATT provisions.⁶

The 1984 Panel Report on “Canada - Administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act” addresses the interpretation of Article XXIX:1:

“The Panel considered the Canadian view ... that the word ‘requirements’ in article III:4 of the General Agreement should be interpreted in the light of Article 12 of the Havana Charter, the general principles of which the contracting parties, in Article XXIX of the General Agreement, agreed to observe to the fullest extent of their executive authority. The Panel noted that the deletion of Article XXIX of the General Agreement was proposed in 1955 and accepted by all but one contracting party, and that - although this Article is technically still in force - it refers to an instrument which itself has never been implemented and the acceptance of which is no longer pending as is assumed in Article XXIX. This leaves considerable doubt as to the manner in which its provisions would have been interpreted if they had entered into force. The Panel further noted that paragraph 1(c) of Article 12 of the Charter was to apply ‘without prejudice to existing international agreements to which Members are parties’, and that paragraph 1(a), (b) and (d) as well as paragraphs 2 and 3 of this Article tended to encourage international investments (including international co-operation in this field). It is therefore doubtful whether paragraph 1(c) which reserved the rights of Members to prescribe ‘reasonable requirements’ should by itself be considered as a ‘general principle’ in the sense of Article XXIX:1 of the General Agreement. The wording of this latter provision suggests that it was not the intention of its drafters that contracting parties should ‘undertake to observe to the fullest extent of their executive authority’ what they would in any case judge to be in their own interest, nor that they should invoke the Charter to detract from their obligations under the General Agreement, but rather that they should observe general principles which reinforced or added to these obligations. In the light of the foregoing facts and considerations the Panel could not subscribe to the assumption that the drafters of Article III had intended the term ‘requirements’ to exclude requirements connected with the regulation of international investments and did not find anything in the negotiating history, the wording, the objectives and the subsequent application of Article III which would support such an interpretation”.⁷

See also Article XX(h) and the Interpretative Note thereto, which indirectly (via a reference to ECOSOC Resolution 30 (IV) of 28 March 1947) refer to the principles of the Havana Charter relating to intergovernmental commodity agreements.

2. Paragraphs 2 and 4: Supersession of the General Agreement by the Charter

Paragraph 2 provides for supersession of the provisions of Part II of the General Agreement (which were drawn from the Geneva Draft Charter submitted by the Committee to the Conference) by the corresponding provisions to be later negotiated at the Havana Conference. The idea appearing in paragraph 4 that if the Charter should cease to be in force after it had entered into force, Part II of the General Agreement would again enter into force, replaced (except for Article XXIII) by the corresponding Charter provisions, was first proposed by a Sub-

Committee the First Session in March 1948. The Report of this Sub-Committee notes in explanation that “it is considered that the form in which [Article XXIII] appear[s] in the Charter is not suitable for the General Agreement”.⁸

The supersession of the General Agreement by the Charter was limited to the provisions of Part II; thus, even after the Charter went into force the General Agreement (including Parts I and III and the Schedules of concessions) would remain in force coexisting with the Charter. When Article XXIX was revised at the Second Session, the words “and superseded by the corresponding provisions of the Charter” were deleted from paragraph 2 “in order to make it clear that when the Charter enters into force, and so long as it remains in force, the General Agreement would be limited to the provisions of Part I and Part III, including the Annexes in so far as they relate to those two parts”.⁹

3. Paragraph 3: “If ... the Havana Charter has not entered into force”

Article XXIX:3 is linked to Article 103:2(b) of the Havana Charter, which provided that if the Charter had not entered into force by 30 September 1949, the Secretary-General of the United Nations was to invite those governments which had deposited instruments of acceptance to enter into consultation to determine whether and on what conditions they desired to bring the Charter into force. The CONTRACTING PARTIES decided on 21 March 1950, when entry into force of the Charter was still pending, that the meeting referred to in Article XIX:3 “shall be held at such time as may subsequently be decided by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.”¹⁰ On 6 December 1950 the United States Department of State issued a statement indicating that the Havana Charter would not be submitted again to the United States Congress. It subsequently became evident that the establishment of the ITO would be indefinitely postponed.¹¹

The depositary of the Havana Charter was the Secretary-General of the United Nations. According to the United Nations, “The conditions for entry into force of the Havana Charter, set forth in its article 103, were not fulfilled within the prescribed time-limit. No instrument of accession was deposited with the Secretary-General”.¹²

At their Eighth Session in October 1953, the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided to convene a Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in October 1954 to review the operation of the General Agreement and to examine to what extent it would be desirable to amend or supplement the General Agreement. This session was the Ninth, or Review, Session which met from October 1954 to March 1955. The October 1953 decision also provided that “the review referred to in this Decision shall be deemed to fulfil the requirements of paragraph 3 of Article XXIX”.¹³

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

There is no Article in the Havana Charter corresponding to Article XXIX of the General Agreement. The initial drafts of the General Agreement did not include any provision in the text of the agreement itself on the relationship with the Charter; this matter was dealt with instead in a proposed protocol of signature. During discussions on the text of the General Agreement in the Tariff Agreement Committee at the Geneva Session of the Preparatory Committee, it was decided to drop the protocol of signature, and to include an undertaking to observe Charter principles as paragraph 1 of Article XXIX.¹⁴

During the Second Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES held in September 1948, the Working Party on Modifications to the General Agreement considered which of the changes that had been made to the Charter text at Havana should be brought into the General Agreement, and in this connection also redrafted Article XXIX.

The Report of the Working Party notes that the re-wording of Article XXIX had been proposed “in order to eliminate certain temporary provisions and to clarify the interpretation of certain points the interpretation of which may give rise to difficulties”. The Working Party Report also notes, “As Article XXIX is contained in Part III of the General Agreement, this text as amended will remain operative after the entry into force of the Havana Charter”.¹⁵ These amendments became effective with the entry into force of the Protocol Modifying Part I and Article XXIX on 24 September 1952, and are the source of the present text of Article XXIX.

During the Review Session of 1954-55, the Review Working Party on Organizational and Functional Questions recommended the deletion of Article XXIX and its interpretative note, and of references to it and the Havana Charter throughout the General Agreement.¹⁶ However, these amendments were included in the 1955 Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX, which failed to gain the requisite unanimous approval and was abandoned.¹⁷

Amendments

1. Except where provision for modification is made elsewhere in this Agreement, amendments to the provisions of Part I of this Agreement or to the provisions of Article XXIX or of this Article shall become effective upon acceptance by all the contracting parties, and other amendments to this Agreement shall become effective, in respect of those contracting parties which accept them, upon acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties and thereafter for each other contracting party upon acceptance by it.

2. Any contracting party accepting an amendment to this Agreement shall deposit an instrument of acceptance with the Secretary-General of the United Nations within such period as the CONTRACTING PARTIES may specify. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may decide that any amendment made effective under this Article is of such a nature that any contracting party which has not accepted it within a period specified by the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall be free to withdraw from this Agreement, or to remain a contracting party with the consent of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

I. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXX

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXX

1. Paragraph 1

(1) Amendments to the General Agreement

The General Agreement has been amended a number of times. The First Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which was held during the Havana Conference, agreed to three protocols of amendment: two which replaced Articles XIV and XXIV respectively with the texts of the corresponding ITO Charter Articles negotiated at Havana,¹ and the Protocol Modifying Certain Provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which added Articles XXV:5(b) and (c) and XXXV and amended Articles XXXII and XXXIII.²

At the Second Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, a Working Party on Modifications to the General Agreement decided to replace Articles III, VI and XVIII with their Havana counterparts, to rewrite Article XXIX and to make a few other minor amendments.³ Due to the different acceptance requirements applying to different provisions of the General Agreement under Article XXX, two protocols were prepared: the Protocol Modifying Part II and Article XXVI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, signed at Geneva on 14 September 1948, which entered into force on 14 December 1948⁴ and the Protocol Modifying Part I and Article XXIX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, signed at Geneva on the same date, which entered into force on 24 September 1952.⁵

The Third Session in 1949 agreed on amendments to the territorial application provisions of Article XXVI:4. These were effected through the Protocol Modifying Article XXVI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, signed at Annecy on 13 August 1949, which entered into force on 28 March 1950.⁶ The Fifth Session in 1950 agreed to an amendment to Article XXVIII, which was effected through paragraph 6 of the Torquay Protocol to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade,⁷ opened for signature on 21 April 1951, which entered into force with regard to paragraph 6 on 19 October 1951.

The Review Session of 28 October 1954 to 8 March 1955 resulted in agreement on a number of amendments to the text of the General Agreement, and on an Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation (OTC). These amendments were incorporated in three instruments, all done at Geneva on 10 March 1955. The Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade⁸ entered into force on 7 October 1957 for all provisions except those providing for a later effective date. The entry into force of the Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade was contingent upon the entry into force of the Agreement on the OTC; the Agreement on the OTC failed to gain the required number of acceptances by the required deadline and was abandoned. The Protocol amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade failed to gain the required acceptance by all contracting parties. At their Twenty-fourth Session, the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided to abandon the Protocol if, by 31 December 1967, it had not entered into force. This condition having been fulfilled, the Protocol was abandoned.⁹

The Protocol Amending the General Agreement to Introduce a Part IV on Trade and Development¹⁰ was done at Geneva on 8 February 1965, and entered into force on 27 June 1966.

(2) “except where provision for modification is made elsewhere in this Agreement”

This phrase was introduced during the drafting of the General Agreement in Geneva to cover changes in Schedules which may be made in accordance with other provisions. Specific reference was made in the original draft to Article II:6 and Articles XXVII and XXVIII. In the course of the discussion Articles XVIII, XIX and XXIII were also mentioned.¹¹ Also, a Secretariat Note of 1956, addressing the question of whether waivers of obligations under Part I of the General Agreement could be granted by less than a unanimous vote, states:

“The phrase ‘Except where provision for modification is made elsewhere ...’ [in Article XXX:1] provides a clear exception for action taken under the provisions of Article XXV:5(a), for

- “(i) if the waiver of an obligation in Part I is not considered to represent a ‘modification’ it can hardly be a change that would require the application of the amendment procedure; and
- “(ii) if such a waiver is considered to be a ‘modification’, this phrase provides an explicit exception from the unanimity requirement for amendment for Part I. ...”¹².

(3) Procedure for submission of amendments for acceptance

(a) Majority required

During the Review Session of 1954-55, the Legal and Drafting Committee considered the procedure for deciding which amendments should be submitted to governments for acceptance pursuant to the provisions of Article XXX. The Report of the Committee on this issue notes that in the view of certain of its members, the decision to draw up a Protocol and submit it to governments as well as the determination of the contents of such a Protocol was a decision requiring only a simple majority, as the Review was “an activity of the CONTRACTING PARTIES within the terms of Article XXV of the General Agreement” for which the required majority was that specified in Article XXV:4.¹³ Other members of the Committee were of the view that the Review Session “must be regarded as in the nature of a constituent meeting of the parties to the Agreement, and the rules to be followed regarding agreement on amendments must be those generally applicable to the amendment of treaties. ...it is reasonable to seek guidance from the provisions of the General Agreement and for this purpose they consider that the provisions of Article XXX are relevant. It would, in their view, be appropriate that the incorporation of amendments in the Protocol should be subject to voting requirements analogous to the acceptance requirements laid down in that Article, i.e., that amendments which require acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties in order to enter into force should be adopted by a two-thirds vote, and of those requiring acceptance by all contracting parties by a unanimous vote.”¹⁴ As a practical solution, the Committee proposed the following Resolution:

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES resolve that, as a rule of procedure applicable to the discussion of Item 3 of the Ninth Session agenda, amendments to be submitted to contracting parties for acceptance pursuant to Article XXX of the General Agreement shall be approved by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast.”¹⁵

This Resolution was approved by a vote of 31-0.¹⁶ The Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX, which was agreed in the Review Session, would have amended Article XXX to provide that amendments to the provisions of the General Agreement would be submitted for acceptance to the contracting parties provided that they had been approved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast.¹⁷ This Protocol did not achieve the required acceptance by all contracting parties, and was abandoned.¹⁸

(b) Inclusion of multiple amendments in a single Protocol

The Legal and Drafting Committee also considered whether amendments could be combined in a single ‘amendment’, or in a single Protocol containing a number of amendments:

“The Committee agreed that, for a legal point of view, there would be no objection to including in a single Protocol all the amendments the entry into force of which is dependent on the acceptance of two-thirds of the contracting parties in accordance with paragraph 1 of Article XXX. This procedure would mean that contracting parties would have to accept or reject the amendments embodied in the Protocol as a whole, and thus would avoid the difficulties (of having several different agreements in force simultaneously) which might arise if contracting parties were free to accept some of the amendments while rejecting others.

“Such a procedure would not deprive any contracting party of any right it enjoys under the General Agreement, since the CONTRACTING PARTIES can decide what would constitute ‘an amendment’ in the sense in which the word is used in Article XXX, and can, therefore, adopt a procedure which has the effect of treating as one amendment all modifications to provisions amendments to which enter into force upon acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties.

“... if modifications requiring unanimous acceptance were included along with others requiring only a two-thirds majority and treated as a single amendment for the purposes of acceptance and entry into force, there would be no room left for the procedure under paragraph 2 of Article XXX even for those modifications which require acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties. Moreover, in that case any contracting party would have a right of veto regarding the entry into force of all modifications included in the amendment whether or not these modifications require unanimous acceptance.

“The Committee concluded that, while there would be no legal objection to treating as a single amendment all the modifications requiring acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties, it would not be legally possible to include as part of that single amendment any modification requiring acceptance by all the contracting parties.

“The Committee ... was of the opinion that, provided the Protocol foresaw separate conditions of acceptance and entry into force for the two types of amendments, it would not be imperative to provide for two or more protocols ...

“The general view of the Committee was, however, that the advantages of drafting two or more protocols were greater than those of drawing up a single protocol of amendments ...”.¹⁹

The amendments agreed in the Review Session were effected through three Protocols.²⁰

(4) “amendments to the provisions of Part I or to the provisions of Article XXIX or of this Article”

(a) Unanimity requirement

During the negotiation of the General Agreement in 1947, it was proposed that only a two-thirds majority be required for amendments to Part I since the corresponding articles in the Charter could be amended with such a majority.²¹ It was agreed, however, that the unanimity requirement for these provisions was essential for the following reasons:

¹⁹W.9/173, p. 2.

²⁰See discussion at SR.9/42, p. 4-5 (decision to draw up two protocols for amendments requiring a two-thirds majority to enter into force, and one protocol for amendments requiring unanimity, providing that amendments therein could be accepted separately). The Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III provided that it would become effective following its acceptance by two-thirds of the governments which were then contracting parties, and entered into effect generally on 7 October 1957. The Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX did not enter into force due to lack of the required unanimous acceptance, and was abandoned in 1967: 15S/65. The Protocol of Organizational Amendments did not enter into force before expiry of the time-limit for signature on 7 April 1966. See Status of Legal Instruments.

²¹EPCT/TAC/PV/15, p. 6 et seq.

- The General Agreement is a trade agreement and the rule in ordinary trade agreements is that they “can only be modified with the unanimous consent of the parties taking part in them”. The two-thirds majority rule was exceptional and applied in the case of Part II “because there are exceptional circumstances which may justify the supersession of these provisions by the provisions of the Charter”²²; and
- “Part I ... is meant to be a provision to which are attached the Schedules embodying results of the tariff negotiations” which “have taken place specifically on the base of the provisions about the most-favoured-nation treatment and so on which will be embodied in Part I”.²³

As noted above, the only protocol of amendment to these provisions which has entered into effect is the 1948 Protocol Modifying Part I and Article XXIX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.²⁴ The 1955 Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX failed to gain the requisite unanimous acceptance and was abandoned.

(b) Modifications or rectifications of Schedules

Paragraph 7 of Article II provides that “Schedules annexed to this Agreement are ... an integral part of Part I of this Agreement”. Hence, after 1948, various GATT Protocols of Rectification (or Rectification and Modification) amending Schedules were drawn up providing that the rectifications or modifications in the Protocol “shall become an integral part of the General Agreement on the day on which this Protocol has been signed by all the Governments which are on that day contracting parties to the General Agreement.”²⁵ Beginning in 1950, certain modifications to Schedules were circulated without inclusion in a Protocol. In 1950, the Working Party on “Modifications and Preparation of Fourth Protocol of Rectifications” examined modifications to the Schedules of Denmark and Italy. The Report of the Working Party notes in this connection:

“The working party considered that the method hitherto employed, of circulating a notification of the proposed modification with the advice that provided no objections were lodged within a specified period - usually thirty days - the modification would become effective at the close of the period, was satisfactory. The working party considered it unnecessary to incorporate modifications so agreed upon in a formal protocol in order to bring them into effect, although it would be desirable from the practical standpoint subsequently to include them in a formal document; particularly since the difficulty of obtaining signature by all the contracting parties might result in such a protocol’s not entering into effect. Consequently, these modifications have not been incorporated in a protocol. The working party suggests that the CONTRACTING PARTIES take note that no objections were lodged to the modifications mentioned above, and consequently the modifications to both schedules will become effective on the day those schedules enter into effect.”²⁶

The following year, the Working Party on “Preparation of First Protocol of Rectifications and Modifications and of First Protocol of Supplementary Concessions” examined questions relating to preparation of a protocol giving effect to various modifications and rectifications. Its Report provides:

“The working party noted that, since the third session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, no protocol of rectifications or of modifications has come into force owing to the impossibility of obtaining the signature of all the contracting parties. Clearly, it was never the intention of Article XXX to place difficulties in the way of making rectifications of an entirely non-substantive character, or to prevent agreed modifications of the concessions contained in the schedules to the General Agreement. Since the drawing up of the First Protocol of Modifications, several modifications have in fact been made to the concessions contained in the schedules, either by decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES or by consultations in accordance with procedures established by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and these have actually entered into force. In view of the fact that the First Protocol of Modifications had not entered into force, the CONTRACTING PARTIES were reluctant at the fourth and fifth sessions to include these further modifications in a formal protocol. Nevertheless, it is clearly desirable that the text of the schedules should be formally modified in order to take account of such changes. Accordingly, the protocol, as drafted, recites that in many cases the modifications of concessions have already entered into force, in which cases the protocol provides merely for the introduction of such modification in the text of the schedules.²⁷

²⁶GATT/CP.4/34, adopted on 1 April 1950, II/141 and para. 4. The following year, these changes were included in the First Protocol of Rectification and Modifications, dated 26 October 1951; see II/147.

In the 1955 Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX of the General Agreement, provision was made for a third paragraph to be added to Article XXX to read as follows:

“Any amendment to the schedules annexed to this Agreement which records rectifications of a purely formal character or modifications resulting from action taken under paragraph 6 of Article II, Article XVIII, Article XXIV, Article XXVII or Article XXVIII, shall become effective on the thirtieth day following certification to this effect by the CONTRACTING PARTIES; Provided that prior to such certification, all contracting parties have been notified of the proposed amendment and no objection has been raised, within thirty days of such notification, by any contracting party on the ground that the proposed amendments are not within the terms of this paragraph.”

Since this amendment had not entered into force, the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided on 17 November 1959 (but subject to the eventual entry into force of this amendment) that a procedure for the certification of rectifications and modifications should nevertheless be adopted and the practice of preparing protocols of rectifications and modifications discontinued.²⁸ Under this procedure three certifications were issued which stated: “On the date of the entry into force of paragraph 3 of Article XXX, this Decision shall constitute a certification by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on that date pursuant to paragraph 3 of Article XXX”. These certifications were then generally treated by contracting parties as if they were in effect.²⁹

Following the abandonment in 1967 of the Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted two Decisions on 19 November 1968 and 26 March 1980 on “Procedures for Modification and Rectification of Schedules of Tariff Concessions”.³⁰ These procedures deal with the modification or rectification of Schedules to reflect changes in concessions which contracting parties are already authorized to make under Articles II, XVIII, XXIV, XXVII or XXVIII. For the text of the 1980 Decision and material on GATT practice in this area, see the discussion of Schedules under Article II.

(5) “in respect of those contracting parties which accept them”

The standard text of accession protocols provides that the provisions of the General Agreement to be applied to contracting parties by the acceding government shall, except as otherwise provided in the Protocol, be the provisions of the General Agreement as of 30 October 1947, “as rectified, amended and otherwise modified by such instruments as may have become effective on the day on which [...] becomes a contracting party.”³¹ Thus, each government acceding under Article XXXIII has, through its acceptance of its accession protocol, accepted all amendments to the General Agreement which have entered into force as of the date it became a contracting party. The rights and obligations of governments succeeding to contracting party status under Article XXVI:5(c) date from the date of independence of the newly-independent State or the date of receipt of certification of a territory’s autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations. Thus, such governments succeed to the status of the sponsoring government on that date with regard to acceptances of amendments.

During the Review Session in 1955, the Deputy Executive Secretary confirmed in reply to a question by Chile “that a contracting party which had not accepted an amendment requiring two-thirds (of the contracting parties) would be bound by the existing text”.³² The 1955 Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III was done on 10 March 1955. On 7 October 1957, when this Protocol had been accepted by two-thirds of the contracting parties, it entered into force for those contracting parties which had accepted it. However, the last acceptance by a government that was a contracting party before 10 March 1955 did not take place until 7 February 1969. During this period, there were two texts of the General Agreement in force for different contracting parties.

Similarly, the Protocol Amending the General Agreement to Introduce a Part IV on Trade and Development was done in Geneva on 8 February 1965. On 27 June 1966, when this Protocol had been accepted by two-thirds of the contracting parties, it entered into force for those contracting parties which had accepted it. A government which succeeds to contracting party status under Article XXVI:5(c) with rights and obligations predating the acceptance of Part IV by its sponsoring government is not bound by Part IV unless it accepts the Part IV Protocol.³³

(6) “other amendments to this Agreement shall become effective ... upon acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties”

It was stated in 1948 that an instrument of acceptance to an amending protocol was a notification that as long as the respective contracting party applied the General Agreement through the Protocol of Provisional Application it would apply the amendment.³⁴

During the Second Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in September 1948, South Africa challenged the validity with respect to it of the Protocol Modifying Certain Provisions of the General Agreement (and in particular the provisions therein adding Article XXXV) as this Protocol had been done on 24 March 1948. South Africa, as a signatory of the Geneva Final Act of 30 October 1948, asserted a legal right to accept the Protocol of Provisional Application and apply provisionally the text of the unamended General Agreement which had been attached to the Geneva Final Act.³⁵ The Chairman ruled that “the signature of the Final Act at Geneva was not an agreement between the signatories but the authentication of a text awaiting acceptance. At any time before acceptance, the signatories could agree to vary the text. If the majority agreed to the amended text, the minority accepting the original text, but not its modifications, could be taken to have accepted the amended text with a reservation”.³⁶

(7) Reservations regarding acceptance of amendments

At the Second Session, in response to the position of South Africa noted above, the Chairman also proposed

“... that we invite the Government of South Africa to sign the Protocol Modifying Certain Provisions of the General Agreement, but with a reservation that they do not accept Article XXXV. We can agree now that, if the Government of South Africa signs the Protocol between now and our next session, we shall give sympathetic consideration to approval of the South African reservation at our next session without altering the legal situation as it now exists. This could then have the effect that the other contracting parties would continue to regard themselves as bound by and having the right to apply the provisions of Article XXXV ... while South Africa would continue to regard themselves as not being bound and would presumably apply the General Agreement to all contracting parties ...”.³⁷

The Chairman stated that the signing of the Protocol with reservations would be legally valid if it is unanimously accepted by the contracting parties, and it would not be necessary to sign another protocol.³⁸ The proposal was adopted unanimously. South Africa then signed the Protocol subject to a reservation of non-acceptance of Article XXXV, which was examined and accepted unanimously.³⁹ This reservation was withdrawn by a notification deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 5 June 1950.⁴⁰

At the 1955 Review Session, on 7 March 1955 the CONTRACTING PARTIES approved a Resolution expressing their unanimous agreement to the definitive acceptance of the General Agreement under Article XXVI subject to a reservation to the effect that Part II would be applied to the fullest extent not inconsistent with legislation which existed on 30 October 1947, or, in the case of a contracting party which had acceded after 30 June 1949, the date of its accession Protocol.⁴¹ Subsequent to the Review Session a number of contracting parties accepted the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade only subject to a reservation for their “existing legislation”.⁴² In a Declaration of 15 November 1957 on “Statements which accompanied the acceptance of the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III”⁴³, the CONTRACTING PARTIES

“Declare that the statements which accompanied the signatures or acceptances by certain contracting parties of the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade are accepted on the understanding that they confirm the legal situation existing under the instrument by which each of these governments became a contracting party. Consequently, each of those contracting parties continues to apply Part II of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (as revised) to the fullest extent not inconsistent with legislation which existed on the date mentioned in the instrument by which it became a contracting party; following acceptance pursuant to Article XXVI, any contracting party will have the right to apply Part II, subject to any reservation accompanying such acceptance in the terms provided for in the Resolution approved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 7 March 1955”.

During the negotiation of the General Agreement at Geneva in 1947 the formulation of the second sentence in paragraph 2 was proposed with the suggestion that it would avoid a reference to expulsion.⁴⁴ It was stated that this provision meant that a contracting party would have the choice either to withdraw from the Agreement or, if the CONTRACTING PARTIES consent, to remain party to it without applying the provisions contained in an amendment which it does not accept.⁴⁵

A Report of the Legal and Drafting Committee in the Review Session of 1954-55 on issues related to amendment of the General Agreement states the view of the Committee with regard to decisions under paragraph 2 of Article XXX, that

“... In this way it would be possible for the CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting in full conformity with their powers under the General Agreement, to ensure that the acceptance by all contracting parties of amendments requiring a two-thirds majority was not delayed indefinitely. ...

“The procedure envisaged in paragraph 2 of Article XXX can only be applied to amendments which have entered into force and would, therefore, not be applicable to amendments which have to be accepted by all contracting parties before they enter into force. An application of that procedure to those amendments would have the effect of depriving any contracting party of the rights it acquired when it became party to the General Agreement and would be inconsistent with the spirit and the letter of it”.⁴⁶

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have never taken a decision under paragraph 2.

The CONTRACTING PARTIES note that as a result of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations, a number of Agreements covering certain non-tariff measures and trade in Bovine Meat and Dairy Products have been drawn up. They further note that these Agreements will go into effect as between the parties to these Agreements as from 1 January 1980 or 1 January 1981 as may be the case and for other parties as they accede to these Agreements.

“3. The CONTRACTING PARTIES also note that existing rights and benefits under the GATT of contracting parties not being parties to these Agreements, including those derived from Article I, are not affected by these Agreements”.⁴⁷

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

The corresponding Article in the Havana Charter is Article 100. Articles on amendment of the Charter appeared as Article 75 of the US Draft Charter, Article 85 of the London and New York Drafts of the Charter, and Article 95 of the Geneva Draft. The Havana Charter differentiated between amendments not involving a change in the obligations assumed by Members, and amendments which altered the obligations of Members. The Conference of the Members would determine by a two-thirds majority whether an amendment was of the former or latter type. The former would become effective upon approval by the Conference by a two-thirds majority of the Members; the latter would become effective for the Members accepting the amendment upon the ninetieth day after two-thirds of the Members had notified the Director-General of their acceptance and thereafter for each remaining Member upon acceptance by it. A Member not accepting the latter type of amendment would be free to withdraw.

In early drafts of the General Agreement the provisions on amendment were grouped with those on supersession by the Charter. Article XXIII of the New York Draft of the General Agreement provided that all amendments would enter into effect upon formal acceptance by two-thirds of the contracting parties. During discussions at Geneva Articles XXIX and XXX were separated and the present formulation of Article XXX was agreed. See the references to drafting history above.

A revised text of Article XXX was included in the 1955 Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX. This text would have added provisions explicitly regulating submission of amendments to the contracting parties for acceptance (see page 1003 above); provisions implementing the second sentence of the present Article XXX:2; and provisions for amendments to schedules by certification in the case of rectifications or modifications implementing action under Articles II:6, XVIII, XXIV, XXVII or XXVIII (see page 1006 above). This Protocol did not enter into force and was abandoned.⁴⁸

1. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXXI

Article XXXI

Withdrawal

Without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 12 of Article XVIII, of Article XXIII or of paragraph 2 of Article XXX, any contracting party may withdraw from this Agreement, or may separately withdraw on behalf of any of the separate customs territories for which it has international responsibility and which at the time possesses full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in this Agreement. The withdrawal shall take effect upon the expiration of six months from the day on which written notice of withdrawal is received by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXI

1. Withdrawal from GATT

The following contracting parties notified the Secretary-General of their withdrawal from the General Agreement:

Contracting party	Effective date of withdrawal	UN Treaty Series
Republic of China	5 May 1950	55 UNTS 196
Lebanon	25 February 1951	77 UNTS 367
Liberia	13 June 1953	163 UNTS 375
Syria	6 August 1951	90 UNTS 324

See also the material on withdrawal of provisional application, in the chapter on provisional application of the General Agreement.

See also the provision in Article XXVII permitting any contracting party “to withhold or to withdraw in whole or in part any concession ... in respect of which such contracting party determines it was initially negotiated with a government that has ... ceased to be a contracting party.”

By a letter dated 27 June 1951 the Government of Czechoslovakia submitted the following comment on the withdrawal by the United States under Article XXVII of concessions which had been initially negotiated with the Government of the Republic of China:

“With reference to the notification of the United States Government (GATT/CP/115) concerning the concessions negotiated with China, I have the honour to renew the declaration made by the Czechoslovak delegate at Torquay on 6 November 1950 that Czechoslovakia does not recognize the validity of the notification of the withdrawal of China from the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade as the notification referred to was made by persons having no legal capacity to act on behalf of China.

“For this reason Czechoslovakia considers the United States withdrawal of the concessions negotiated with China illegal.”¹

Article XXXI refers to Articles XVIII:12, XXIII and XXX:2 because these provisions refer to withdrawal.

2. Withdrawal of provisional application

The Protocol of Provisional Application of the General Agreement and the various accession protocols provide that governments applying them “shall be free to withdraw such application, and such withdrawal shall take effect upon the expiration of sixty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received”. See also the material on this subject in the chapter on provisional application of the General Agreement.

3. Termination of Provisional Application of GATT

See material in the chapters on Article XXVI, provisional application, and Institutions and Procedure.

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

The corresponding Article in the Havana Charter is Article 102. The 30 October 1947 text of the General Agreement provided that withdrawal could only be effected after 1 January 1951. The amendments to Article XXXI which were agreed at the 1954-55 Review Session deleted this date, and added a reference to paragraph 12 of Article XVIII (which was drafted at the Review Session). These amendments were effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, which entered into force on 7 October 1957.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXXII

Article XXXII

Contracting Parties

1. The contracting parties to this Agreement shall be understood to mean those governments which are applying the provisions of this Agreement under Articles XXVI or XXXIII or pursuant to the Protocol of Provisional Application.

2. At any time after the entry into force of this Agreement pursuant to paragraph 6 of Article XXVI, those contracting parties which have accepted this Agreement pursuant to paragraph 4 of Article XXVI may decide that any contracting party which has not so accepted it shall cease to be a contracting party.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXII

(1) “governments”

The contracting parties were defined as “governments” and not as “states” or “nations” so that governments with less than complete sovereignty could be contracting parties to GATT.¹ A number of such governments have been contracting parties, including Southern Rhodesia when it was under United Kingdom sovereignty, Hong Kong and Macau.

(2) Status as a contracting party

The government of Southern Rhodesia, upon certification by the United Kingdom of its autonomy in commercial matters, participated in the negotiation of the General Agreement during the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee for the Havana Conference, was a signatory of the Final Act of the Second Session, and accepted the Protocol of Provisional Application under paragraph 3 thereof, thereby acquiring the status of a contracting party.² On 12 November 1965, the United Kingdom delegation gave notice that “Her Majesty’s Government in the United Kingdom consider the Southern Rhodesian Government’s purported declaration of independence to be an act of rebellion against the authority of Her Majesty's Government and against the Constitution as by law established. It is an illegal act and ineffective in law. Her Majesty the Queen, in the exercise of the authority conferred on Her by Sections 42 and 43 of the Southern Rhodesian Constitution, has accordingly dismissed the Prime Minister and Ministers of the Southern Rhodesian Government from their offices".³ However, no determination was made that Southern Rhodesia had ceased to be a contracting party in its own right nor that this status should be suspended. The Government of Zimbabwe, which became independent on 18 April 1980, did not subsequently become a contracting party through Article XXVI:5(c) nor through Article XXXIII, but succeeded to the contracting party status of Southern Rhodesia.⁴

¹EPCT/198; EPCT/TAC/PV.22, pp. 21-22. Concerning acceptance of the General Agreement by “governments” see also EPCT/TAC/PV.12, EPCT/TAC/PV.13, EPCT/TAC/SR.12, EPCT/TAC/SR.13.

The Government of the United Kingdom, which was internationally responsible for the territory of Palestine under a League of Nations mandate, negotiated in 1947 on behalf of the mandated territory of Palestine for concessions, and accepted the Protocol of Protocol Application under paragraph 2 thereof on behalf of the Mandated Territory of Palestine on 20 March 1948. On 15 May 1948 the League of Nations mandate was terminated. On 9 May 1949 the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Declaration providing, inter alia, that "Whereas the Government of the United Kingdom ceased to be responsible for the mandated territory of Palestine on 15 May, 1948" and that "the United Kingdom ceased, as from 15 May 1948, to be a contracting party in respect of the territory formerly included in the Palestine mandate ...".⁵ See also the material under Articles XXVI and XXVII on international responsibility, and changes in international responsibility, for territories in respect of which a contracting party has accepted the General Agreement or has agreed to apply provisionally the General Agreement under the Protocol of Provisional Application or a protocol of accession.

At its meeting on 19 June 1992, the Council decided that the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should refrain from participating in the business of the Council.⁶ At its meeting on 16-17 June 1993, the Council agreed in the light of United Nations General Assembly Resolution 47/1 to modify this decision as follows: "The Council considers that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot continue automatically the contracting party status of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the GATT, and therefore decides that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for accession to the GATT and that it shall not participate in the work of the Council and its subsidiary bodies. The Council further invites other committees and subsidiary bodies of the GATT, including the Committees of the Tokyo Round Agreements and the Committee on Trade and Development, to take the necessary decisions in accordance with the above".⁷

The Czechoslovak Republic ceased to exist on December 31, 1992, and ceased to be a contracting party. It was replaced by the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic as of 1 January 1993, which each acceded to GATT effective 15 April 1993 under Protocols of Accession which provided for entry into force of their rights and obligations as of 1 January 1993.⁸

The Annecy Protocol, Torquay Protocol, and subsequent Protocols of Accession state that, for the purposes of Article XXXII:2, accession to the General Agreement pursuant to the respective Protocol shall be regarded as acceptance of the Agreement pursuant to paragraph 4 of Article XXVI ("paragraph 3" in Protocols drawn up before 7 October 1957 when the present text of Article XXVI came into force).⁹ Protocols of Accession also state that the government concerned "shall, upon entry into force of this Protocol ... become a contracting party to the General Agreement, as defined in Article XXXII thereof ...".¹⁰

There is no equivalent Article in the Havana Charter. Article XXXII was drafted at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee as part of the final provisions for the General Agreement. I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXXIII

Article XXXIII

Accession

A government not party to this Agreement, or a government acting on behalf of a separate customs territory possessing full autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations and of the other matters provided for in this Agreement, may accede to this Agreement, on its own behalf or on behalf of that territory, on terms to be agreed between such government and the CONTRACTING PARTIES. Decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under this paragraph shall be taken by a two-thirds majority.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXIII

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXIII

1. “government...”

The contracting parties were defined as “governments” and not as “states” or “nations” so that governments with less than complete sovereignty could be contracting parties to GATT.¹ See also Article XXXII.

At the September 1992 Council meeting, the Chairman made the following statement concerning the accession of Chinese Taipei:

¹EPCT/198; EPCT/TAC/PV.22, pp. 21-22. Concerning acceptance of the General Agreement by “governments” see also EPCT/TAC/PV.12, EPCT/TAC/PV.13, EPCT/TAC/SR.12, EPCT/TAC/SR.13.

“The Chairman said that in recent months he had carried out extensive consultations on the subject of establishing a working party to consider the possible accession of Chinese Taipei, known in the GATT as the Separate Customs Territory of Taiwan, Penghu, Kinmen and Matsu. All contracting parties had acknowledged the view that there was only one China, as expressed in the United Nations General Assembly Resolution 2758 of 25 October 1971. Many contracting parties, therefore, had agreed with the view of the People's Republic of China (PRC) that Chinese Taipei, as a separate customs territory, should not accede to the GATT before the PRC itself. Some contracting parties had not shared this view. There had been, however, a general desire to establish a working party for Chinese Taipei. Taking account of all the views expressed, he had concluded that there was a consensus among contracting parties on the following terms, which also met the PRC's concerns:

“First, the Working Party on China's status as a contracting party should continue its work expeditiously, taking account of the pace of China's economic reforms, and report to the Council as soon as possible.

“Second, a Working Party on Chinese Taipei should be established at the present meeting, and should report to the Council expeditiously, with the following terms of reference and composition:

Terms of reference

‘To examine the application of the Separate Customs Territory of Taiwan, Penghu, Kinmen and Matsu (referred to as “Chinese Taipei”) to accede to the General Agreement under Article XXXIII and to submit to the Council recommendations which may include a draft Protocol of Accession.’

“... Third, the Council should give full consideration to all views expressed, in particular that the Council should examine the report of the Working Party on China and adopt the Protocol for the PRC's accession before examining the report and adopting the Protocol for Chinese Taipei, while noting that the working party reports should be examined independently.”²

The Chairman then proposed that the Council take note of his statement and agree to establish a working party on the basis of the understanding and the terms of reference and composition he had mentioned.³

2. “two-thirds majority”

The Report of the Working Party on “Accession at Annecy” of June 1949 notes that “It was agreed that the two-thirds majority required by Article XXXIII referred to such a majority of the number of contracting parties at the time at which the decision was taken, and not of the number of contracting parties at any later time at which an acceding government accedes in consequence of the decision”.⁴

During the Review Session of 1954-55, it was agreed to amend the last sentence of Article XXXIII to read: “Decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES under this paragraph shall be taken by a majority comprising two thirds of the contracting parties”.⁵ However, this amendment was included in the Protocol of Organizational Amendments, which did not enter into force.

3. Procedures for accession

The Protocol of Provisional Application and the original text of the General Agreement, which were drawn up at the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, were annexed to the Final Act adopted at the conclusion of that Session, dated 30 October 1947. Paragraph 4 of the Protocol of Provisional Application specified that the Protocol was open for signature by any government signatory to the Final Act, until 30 June 1948 at the latest. All of the governments signatory to the Final Act except for Chile signed the Protocol before 30 June 1948. On 7 September 1948 the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided that “a government signatory of the Final Act of October 30, 1947 on behalf of which the Protocol of Provisional Application was not signed by June 30, 1948 shall not be considered to be a 'party' within the meaning of Article XXXII of the General Agreement in its provisional application and consequently that any such government may accede to such Agreement pursuant to the accession provisions of Article XXXIII".⁶ Thus, the first government to accede under Article XXXIII was Chile, which acceded under the Protocol for the Accession of Signatories to the Final Act of 30 October 1947.⁷

The modalities of accession to the GATT were first given in-depth consideration in 1949 at the Third Session, which took place in Annecy. Procedures Governing Negotiations for Accession and a Model Protocol of Accession were agreed at that time, together with the Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession, which provided for the accession of Denmark, the Dominican Republic, Finland, Greece, Haiti, Italy, Liberia, Nicaragua, Sweden, and Uruguay. The Procedures agreed at Annecy provide: "The secretariat, on receiving a communication from a government not party to the General Agreement which wishes to enter into negotiations with contracting parties with a view to acceding to the Agreement, would notify the contracting parties ...".⁸ Upon circulation of such a communication, the Council establishes a working party to examine the application for accession to the General Agreement and to submit recommendations to the Council which may include a draft protocol of accession. Many accession negotiations have taken place at the same time as ongoing trade negotiating rounds.

At its meeting on 27 October 1993, the Council agreed that the following procedures should henceforth be followed in the organization and pursuit of negotiations on accession to the General Agreement, without prejudice to procedures currently applied.

- "1. Upon reception of a formal request for accession to the General Agreement and its approval by the Council or by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Secretariat will address a communication to the acceding government in which it will outline the normal procedures followed by working parties on accession, and request that the acceding government submit a Memorandum on its Foreign Trade Régime that covers but is not limited to the topics of the outline contained in the Annex [to document L/7317]. This outline may be revised and amended as necessary in future, in the light of experience and of the results of the Uruguay Round.
- "2. It would be understood that the Secretariat will continue to make available to the government of the acceding country the necessary technical assistance facilities.
- "3. It would also be understood that in the course of its deliberations, the working party may request the Secretariat to prepare background documentation on specific issues or questions regarding the acceding government's trade policies which have arisen in the course of the examination by the working party."⁹

In current practice, after submission of the memorandum on the foreign trade régime, the CONTRACTING PARTIES invite questions from all contracting parties to which the applicant government provides written answers. The discussion in the working party is reflected in the report of the working party to the Council, to which are attached a draft Decision and Protocol of Accession. Accession tariff negotiations are held between the acceding government and those contracting parties to the GATT which wish to participate therein, in parallel with the working party. The accession schedule of concessions is annexed to the draft Protocol of Accession; it contains the concessions of the applicant government, and may include concessions of other governments. When the tariff negotiations have been concluded, the report of the accession working party together with the draft Decision and Protocol of Accession are submitted to the Council for adoption of the report and approval of the texts of the draft Decision and Protocol of Accession. A decision on accession is taken, by a two-thirds majority of the contracting parties, and the Protocol then enters into effect thirty days after signature by the applicant government.¹⁰

At the November 1994 Council meeting, the Chairman of the Council made a statement on management of accession negotiations.

“... After consultations with delegations, it has ... been possible to identify a certain number of points which may help to guide both the Secretariat and governments in handling the negotiations on accession. These points ... are of an indicative nature; their aim is to rationalize the manner of work on accession negotiations when an unusually large number of requests for accession must be dealt with. They are not intended in any way to substitute for the established procedures which are maintained.

“The points are as follows:

- “1. the management of accession negotiations in the GATT should ensure the wider acceptance and effective application of rules and disciplines under the GATT, thus contributing towards the reform processes in the applicant countries or territories, and towards the objective of further strengthening the multilateral trading system;
- “2. there shall be no lowering of present standards for terms of accession to GATT;
- “3. accession negotiations should be limited to issues related to GATT rights and obligations including market access to the applicant country or territory;
- “4. accession negotiations should be approached on a case-by-case basis, while respecting the established procedures for negotiations with all applicants;
- “5. adequate lead-time should be allowed in the preparatory stage of accession negotiations before meetings of the respective working parties are convened, in order to allow both the applicant government and members of the working party to better prepare themselves;
- “6. in line with 5 above, more than one round of questions and answers may be organized if necessary; subsequent rounds will be designed to select and clarify issues before an initial meeting of the working party;
- “7. adequate lead-time should be allowed for governments to examine documentation;¹¹ the conformity of such documentation with established procedures should be checked in advance by the Secretariat, which would inform contracting parties and the applicant government of its views;
- “8. the Secretariat may be invited to examine the technical assistance requirements of the applicant government so as to elaborate its own plans for assistance and further coordinate them with those of individual governments;
- “9. the applicant government should be encouraged to undertake the necessary in-depth preparation for the accession negotiations before the working party meetings, inter alia, through informal consultations with contracting parties and the Secretariat;
- “10. applicant governments should also avail themselves, to the extent possible, of the training activities of GATT as part of their preparation for negotiations and to fully use their GATT observer status, in particular, to attend meetings of other accession working parties and of various committees.”¹²

4. “terms to be agreed between such government and the CONTRACTING PARTIES”

(1) Provisions in protocols of accession

Certain provisions have appeared in almost all protocols of accession since the Annecy Protocol. The following text is drawn from the Decision and Protocol of Accession of Bolivia. Cross-references are provided to the places in this Index where material on the provision concerned can be found.

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES...

“Decide, in accordance with Article XXXIII of the General Agreement, that the Government of [...] may accede to the General Agreement on the terms set out in the Protocol of Accession.

“PROTOCOL OF ACCESSION OF [...]”

“The governments which are contracting parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (hereinafter referred to as ‘contracting parties’ and the ‘General Agreement’, respectively), the European Economic Community and the Government of [...] (hereinafter referred to as ‘[...]’),¹³....

“Have through their representatives agreed as follows:

PART I - GENERAL

“1. [...] shall, upon entry into force of this Protocol pursuant to paragraph 6, become a contracting party to the General Agreement, as defined in Article XXXII thereof,¹⁴ and shall apply to contracting parties provisionally and subject to this Protocol:

- (a) Parts I, III and IV of the General Agreement, and
- (b) Part II of the General Agreement to the fullest extent not inconsistent with the relevant legislation of [...] existing on the date of this Protocol.¹⁵

The obligations incorporated in paragraph 1 of Article I by reference to Article III and those incorporated in paragraph 2(b) of Article II by reference to Article VI of the General Agreement shall be considered as falling within Part II for the purpose of this paragraph.¹⁶

“2. (a) The provisions of the General Agreement to be applied to contracting parties by [...] shall, except as otherwise provided in this Protocol, be the provisions contained in the text annexed to the Final Act of the second session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, as rectified, amended or otherwise modified by such instruments as may have become effective on the day on which [...] becomes a contracting party.¹⁷

¹³The reference to the European Economic Community is necessary because the EEC is not itself a contracting party.

¹⁴See material on Article XXXII in this Index.

¹⁵Concerning the definition of “existing legislation” and the relevant date for the purpose of provisional application, see the chapter on provisional application of the General Agreement.

¹⁶This sentence replaces for the acceding contracting party the provisions of the first interpretative note to Article I:1. See references to this note under Articles I and II.

¹⁷The text annexed to the Final Act of the second session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment is the text of the General Agreement as agreed on 30 October 1947 (55 UNTS 187, UN Sales No. 1947.II/10). A list and overview of the amendments to the General Agreement can be found under Article XXX. A list of the sources of each of the provisions of the present text of the General Agreement, their effective dates and their respective citations in the United Nations Treaty Series or in GATT publications appears as an appendix to the text of the General Agreement published by the GATT Secretariat.

(b) In each case in which paragraph 6 of Article V, sub-paragraph 4(d) of Article VII, and sub-paragraph 3(c) of Article X of the General Agreement refer to the date of that Agreement, the applicable date in respect of [...] shall be the date of this Protocol.¹⁸

PART II - SCHEDULE

“3. The schedule in the Annex shall, upon the entry into force of this Protocol, become a schedule to the General Agreement relating to [...].

“4. (a) In each case in which paragraph 1 of Article II of the General Agreement refers to the date of the Agreement, the applicable date in respect of each product which is the subject of a concession provided for in the Schedule annexed to this Protocol shall be the date of this Protocol.¹⁹

(b) For the purpose of the reference in paragraph 6(a) of Article II of the General Agreement to the date of that Agreement, the applicable date in respect of the Schedule annexed to this Protocol shall be the date of this Protocol.²⁰

PART III - FINAL PROVISIONS

“5. This Protocol shall be deposited with the Director-General to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. It shall be open for acceptance, by signature or otherwise, by [...] until [date].²¹ It shall also be open for acceptance by contracting parties and by the European Economic Community.

“6. This Protocol shall enter into force on the thirtieth day following the day upon which it shall have been accepted by [...].

“7. [...] having become a contracting party to the General Agreement pursuant to paragraph 1 of this Protocol, may accede to the General Agreement upon the applicable terms of this Protocol by deposit of an instrument of accession with the Director-General. Such accession shall take effect on the day on which the General Agreement enters into force pursuant to Article XXVI or on the thirtieth day following the day of the deposit of the instrument of accession, whichever is the later. Accession to the General Agreement pursuant to this paragraph shall, for the purposes of paragraph 2 of Article XXXII of that Agreement, be regarded as acceptance of the Agreement pursuant to paragraph 4 of Article XXVI thereof.²²

“8. [...] may withdraw its provisional application of the General Agreement prior to its accession thereto pursuant to paragraph 7 and such withdrawal shall take effect on the sixtieth day following the day on which written notice thereof is received by the Director-General.²³

“9. The Director-General shall promptly furnish a certified copy of this Protocol and a notification of each acceptance thereof, pursuant to paragraph 6 to each contracting party, to the European Economic Community, and to [...].

“10. This Protocol shall be registered in accordance with the provisions of Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations.²⁴

¹⁸The text of each of these provisions refers to “the date of this Agreement”: see the discussion in this Index under Article XXVI:1 and each of these provisions. Article XXVI:1 provides that “The date of this Agreement shall be 30 October 1947”. This paragraph in the accession protocol replaces that date, for the purpose of the obligations of the acceding contracting party, with the date of the accession protocol.

¹⁹See the material on “date of this Agreement” under Article II:1.

²⁰See the material in this Index on Article II:6(a) and the adjustment of specific duties.

²¹The accession protocol of Cambodia, which was agreed in 1961 and provided no deadline for acceptance, has not yet been accepted by Cambodia. Later protocols of accession have provided for a deadline for acceptance by the acceding contracting party.

(2) Reservations in accession protocols and commitments in accession protocols

Paragraph 4 of the protocol of accession of Switzerland provides a reservation with regard to the application of the provisions of Article XI of the General Agreement to the extent necessary to permit Switzerland to apply import restrictions pursuant to certain Swiss legislation; see under Article XI. Paragraph 5 of the same protocol provides a reservation with regard to the provisions of Article XV:6: see under Article XV:6.²⁶ By the Decision of 1 April 1966 “The CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting pursuant to Article XXXIII of the General Agreement, decide that Switzerland may accede to the General Agreement on the terms set out in the said Protocol.”²⁷

The Protocols of Accession of Poland, Romania, and Hungary (and the corresponding Decisions on accession) each provide for a reservation with respect to Article XV:6 identical to that of Switzerland.²⁸

Other protocols of accession have provided for time-limited reservations for existing measures inconsistent with the General Agreement, such as certain internal taxes of the Philippines and Thailand²⁹, the Egyptian consolidation of economic development tax and import taxes and surcharges of Costa Rica³⁰, and quantitative restrictions maintained by Costa Rica.³¹

Certain recent accession protocols also refer to additional commitments listed in specified paragraphs of the relevant accession working party report. Issues dealt with in these commitments have included, for instance: elimination of discrimination in internal taxation or of import charges in excess of bound duty rates; application of customs charges consistent with Articles II and VIII; trade effects of maximum price controls on consumer items; customs valuation practices including elimination of uplifts or official prices; publication of trade regulations; elimination of quantitative restrictions; notification and consultation on request regarding quantitative restrictions; non-discriminatory application of quantitative restrictions; non-arbitrary application of technical standards and certification requirements to imports; application of anti-dumping measures only in accordance with Article VI and of safeguard measures only in accordance with Article XIX; notification of subsidies under Article XVI and of state trading under Article XVII; reduction of certain export financing programmes; elimination of domestic-content requirements for purchasing by State enterprises; operation of free trade zones; revision of rules of regional trade groupings so as to be compatible with GATT; notification and periodic reporting on regional trade agreements to which the acceding government is a party; and acceptance of Tokyo Round agreements such as those on import licensing, customs valuation and anti-dumping procedures.³²

See also the discussion of reservations on acceptance under Article XXVI, and the discussion of reservations to protocols of amendment under Article XXX.

²⁵While each of the English, French and Spanish texts of the accession protocol itself is authentic, in order to avoid the burden of translation and authentication of other-language texts of entire tariff schedules, the Schedule of concessions attached thereto is authentic only in the language specified by the contracting party submitting it. 5. Provisional accession

“Provisional accession” was a concept used during the 1955-1975 period. It was first implemented in the case of Switzerland.³³ The 1956 Report of the Working Party on “Arrangements and Procedures for the Accession of Switzerland”³⁴ recommended arrangements and procedures to enable Switzerland to accede to the GATT, in the first place provisionally and then definitively. These arrangements provided that Switzerland would “enter into tariff negotiations with a view to provisional accession”³⁵ and that a declaration would be drawn up providing for entry into force of the tariff concessions for a limited period, and for trade between the signatories and Switzerland to be governed by its terms which would incorporate by reference all the provisions of the General Agreement. The Declaration would be accepted as valid even though accompanied by certain reservations by Switzerland. “The Working Party felt that it was desirable that a fixed period should be specified for the duration of the period of provisional accession. They felt that this period, which might be extended upon request of Switzerland by a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, should be relatively short ...”.³⁶

Upon completion of the arrangements for provisional accession the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Declaration on “Provisional Accession of the Swiss Confederation”³⁷ and a Resolution on “Participation of Switzerland in the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.”³⁸ At the same time they placed the following Understanding on record:

“In view of the wording of the provisions of Articles XXV and XXXII, it is not possible, from a strictly legal point of view, to give full voting rights to Switzerland. However, in the normal course of business this is not very important since the CONTRACTING PARTIES do not usually proceed to a formal vote in reaching decisions; generally the Chairman takes the sense of the meeting and Switzerland would have the same opportunity as contracting parties to express its opinion”.³⁹

A similar understanding had been recorded with respect to the 1953 Declaration on “Commercial Relations between certain Contracting Parties to the General Agreement and Japan”.⁴⁰

The Declaration on Swiss provisional accession provided that “the commercial relations between the participating countries and the Swiss Confederation shall ... be based upon the General Agreement as if the Swiss Confederation had acceded to the General Agreement in accordance with the relevant procedures and as if the schedules annexed to this Declaration were schedules annexed to the General Agreement”.⁴¹ Provisional accession subsequently granted to other governments, pending their definitive accession, was not accompanied by tariff negotiations.

The Chairman of the 1959 Working Party which recommended provisional accession for Israel explained that “although the provisions of Article XXXIII of the General Agreement did not specifically require countries to enter into tariff negotiations before accession, the Working Party had thought it desirable to follow the precedent set by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in dealing with previous requests for accession and to await the outcome of tariff negotiations before drawing up the terms for the full accession of Israel. ... As Israel will accede provisionally to the General Agreement without a schedule of tariff concessions ... the Working Party had felt that contracting parties accepting the Declaration should not have to accept direct obligations towards Israel in respect of the modification or withdrawal of tariff concessions. Israel would, however, receive the benefits of most-favoured-nation treatment under Article I of the General Agreement”.⁴²

³³Provisional accession as a concept was earlier proposed by Japan in 1953, to facilitate accession by Japan in advance of the next general round of trade negotiations (see L/109, proposal by Japan of 4 August 1953); however it was instead decided to adopt the Decision of 23 October 1953 on “Participation of Japan in the Sessions of the Contracting Parties” (2S/30) and the Declaration of 24 October 1953 on “Commercial Relations between Certain Contracting Parties to the General Agreement and Japan” (2S/31). There have been no formal arrangements for provisional accession since 1975, the date of the Declaration on Provisional Accession of Colombia. While there have been requests for provisional accession in a few cases, each of the governments concerned has decided to proceed directly to the accession process without the intermediate step of provisional accession.⁴³

A table of provisional accessions appears in the Appendix to this book.

6. De facto application of the General Agreement

See Article XXVI.

B. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN ACCESSION UNDER ARTICLE XXXIII AND SUCCESSION TO CONTRACTING PARTY STATUS UNDER ARTICLE XXVI:5(c)

Article XXVI:5(c) provides that if any customs territory in respect of which a contracting party has previously accepted the Agreement possesses or acquires autonomy in respect of its external commercial relations and the other matters provided for in the General Agreement, it shall be deemed to be a contracting party if it is sponsored by the responsible contracting party through submission of a declaration establishing the fact of such autonomy. A government becoming a contracting party under Article XXVI:5(c) does so on the terms and conditions previously accepted by the metropolitan government on behalf of the territory in question, including any applicable Schedule of concessions. For this reason, some newly-independent States which were eligible to use the special procedure for succession to contracting party status under Article XXVI:5(c) have opted instead for accession under Article XXXIII.⁴⁴ For instance, Cambodia chose to accede under Article XXXIII in order not to assume the former Schedule of concessions of France for Indo-China.⁴⁵

In 1972, upon its independence, Bangladesh requested accession to GATT in accordance with the provisions of Article XXXIII. In Council discussion, a number of contracting parties considered that “Given the undertaking of Bangladesh to accept the full obligations of a schedule of tariff bindings identical with that applied before independence, pending its renegotiation under Article XXVIII, as well as all other obligations of GATT membership ... it [was not] necessary to set up the usual working party to consider and report on the suitability of Bangladesh membership. As the circumstances in this case were unusual the CONTRACTING PARTIES should be ready to modify the usual procedures in dealing with it.”⁴⁶

An accession Protocol was drawn up on these terms and Bangladesh became a contracting party to the General Agreement.⁴⁷

⁴³See Application of Costa Rica for provisional accession in L/5830, discussion at C/M/191; Costa Rica decided to accede to the General Agreement without provisional accession.

⁴⁴See, e.g., L/3339 and C/M/61, p. 18 concerning the request for accession by the Democratic Republic of Congo, and more generally the Note by the Secretariat on “Developing Countries and Accession to the GATT”, INT(80)42 of 23 September 1980.

⁴⁵A Recommendation of 22 November 1957 (6S/10), stating that “Cambodia ... [has] possessed ... full autonomy for a considerable period and ... it would be appropriate to apply the recommended procedures [for sponsorship under Article XXVI:5(c)]” to Cambodia, provided for application of the General Agreement de facto by contracting parties in their relations with Cambodia (see also GATT/CP.5/50, GATT/CP.5/SR.24, p. 3). Such application was then extended “until such time as Cambodia accedes to the General Agreement” by the Decision of 17 November 1958 on “Arrangements for the Accession of Cambodia” (7S/17). In 1958 Cambodia requested accession under Article XXXIII, not Article XXVI:5(c), in order not to assume the former Schedule of concessions of France for Indo-China; see statement in L/900, Spec/275/58. Cambodia then negotiated a Protocol of Accession under Article XXXIII (11S/12), including negotiation of a Schedule of concessions. The Protocol provided that it was opened to signature by Cambodia, by contracting parties and by the European Community, with no deadline for signature. In 1964 Cambodia advised that it did not, for the moment, envisage accepting the accession Protocol (L/2271). As Cambodia has not yet signed its Protocol of Accession, this Protocol has not entered into force. The concessions initially negotiated with Cambodia by Czechoslovakia, the EEC and Norway have not been withdrawn under Article XXVII. As of August 1995, Cambodia has not requested succession to contracting party to the General Agreement under Article XXVI:5(c), and appears in the list of de facto contracting parties in the appendix.

In 1992, Slovenia became independent and requested accession under Article XXXIII, stating at the July 1992 Council meeting that “Slovenia intended to continue to apply the GATT’s provisions in force before its independence, including the obligations pursuant to the Schedule of Concessions of the former SFRY [Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia]. Slovenia expected that the terms of accession to be agreed upon by itself and the CONTRACTING PARTIES should reflect the conditions that had prevailed thus far.... Her Government considered that the existing GATT provisions did not adequately address situations such as that of Slovenia. In the absence of more appropriate provisions, however, it had decided to seek accession to the General Agreement in accordance with the provisions of Article XXXIII, with the hope that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would be prepared to accept Slovenia as a contracting party without further negotiations and to agree that the terms of accession should reflect the conditions which had thus far prevailed.... In Slovenia’s case... there was no legal and internationally-recognized entity of the former SFRY that could make the necessary declaration on its behalf under Article XXVI:5(c). Slovenia hoped, therefore, that the Council would agree to accept its proposal, and requested the Secretariat to draft a Protocol of Accession which would include a Schedule identical to that applied before independence. ...”

A number of delegations stated that

“... they could not accept Slovenia’s immediate accession without negotiations, as had been done when Bangladesh had applied for accession ... They suggested that it would be in both Slovenia’s and the CONTRACTING PARTIES’ interests to follow the normal accession procedures of Article XXXIII, and requested that a working party with standard terms of reference be established to examine Slovenia’s request, including the memorandum on its foreign trade régime, and to prepare the necessary instruments. They would work constructively in the working party with a view to concluding the process as quickly as possible.”

The establishment of a working party in accordance with Article XXXIII procedures was accepted by Slovenia and the Council so decided.⁴⁸ See also under Article XXXII concerning the contracting party status of Yugoslavia.

On 27 November 1992, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic (CSFR) submitted a Request for Participation in GATT of the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic.⁴⁹ At the Forty-eighth Session in December 1992, the Chairman “recalled that the CSFR had announced that it would cease to exist on 31 December 1992 and that, as of 1 January 1993, that State would be replaced by two successor States, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic. Both these States had expressed their interest in becoming GATT contracting parties and their determination to continue to fulfil the obligations incumbent upon the CSFR under the General Agreement, including in particular those set up in Schedule X. Moreover, the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic had also undertaken to accept the Arrangement Regarding International Trade in Textiles and its Protocols of Extension, as well as the Tokyo Round Agreements and Arrangements to which the CSFR was currently a party, namely the Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade, the Agreement on Implementation of Article VII, the Agreement on Import Licensing Procedures, and the Agreement on Implementation of Article VI.

“It appeared that contracting parties were ready to agree that the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic accede to the General Agreement, pursuant to Article XXXIII, under the same terms as those presently applied by the CSFR, without carrying out any negotiations, and to agree on transitional arrangements for the interim period until the necessary procedures had been fulfilled”

The representative of the US then stated that

“... The Chairman’s statement had indicated that in the case of the accessions to GATT of the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic under Article XXXIII, negotiations would not be necessary. The United States did not intend that the participation in the GATT of the newly independent states should be on a basis that was different from that of the CSFR. However, it needed to place on record the conditions under which – in this situation and in potential similar situations in the future – it could accept that negotiations were not necessary. These conditions were: (1) that the defunct State had a high level of obligations under GATT with a bound tariff schedule at meaningful levels; (2) that the new States were fully willing and able to accept an identical level of obligations and the same tariff schedule; and, (3) that the new States were not contemplating important reorientations to their basic trade and economic policies which would nullify or impair trade opportunities enjoyed by other contracting parties in their markets.”

The CONTRACTING PARTIES took note of the statements and adopted a “Decision on Interim Application of the General Agreement”:

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting pursuant to Article XXV of the General Agreement,

“Decide, in view of the exceptional circumstances, to apply, from 1 January 1993, the General Agreement and the relevant instruments negotiated under the auspices of the GATT, to the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic, on an interim basis, as if they had already acceded thereto. It shall be understood that the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic will also apply the General Agreement and the relevant instruments to the contracting parties and that their respective Protocols of Accession will provide for the acceptance and entry into force of their rights and obligations as of 1 January 1993. During the transitional period, the Governments of the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic are entitled to participate in all activities of the CONTRACTING PARTIES and their subsidiary bodies but shall not participate in the decision-making process. This transitional arrangement shall expire on the date of entry into force of the respective Protocols of Accession to the General Agreement of the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic, or on 1 May 1993, whichever date is the earlier.”⁵⁰

At the same time a Decision was adopted inviting the Secretariat to prepare draft protocols of accession and accession decisions for the Czech Republic and Slovak Republic, and stating that tariff schedules encompassing the concessions in Schedule X - Czechoslovakia were to be annexed to each protocol of accession.⁵¹ Pursuant to this Decision the protocols and decisions were submitted for approval by the Council at its first meeting in 1993. Upon approval at the February 1993 Council meeting, the texts of the Protocols were put to a vote, and when the required two-thirds majority had been obtained, the Protocols of Accession were opened for acceptance and entered into force for the Czech Republic and for the Slovak Republic on 15 April 1993, thirty days after each had accepted its Protocol.

III. PREPARATORY WORK AND SUBSEQUENT MODIFICATIONS

The Article in the Havana Charter corresponding to GATT Article XXIII is Article 71.

The text of the General Agreement as adopted 30 October 1947 required the consent of all contracting parties as a precondition to accession of any new contracting party. Since Article 17 of the Havana Charter permitted contracting parties to the GATT to withhold application of concessions in their GATT Schedules with respect to the trade of an ITO Member that had not become a GATT contracting party, it was proposed during the Havana Conference “to amend the GATT to permit the admission of a country as a contracting party upon a vote of two-thirds of the contracting parties instead as of a unanimous vote as at present required”. Accordingly, the second sentence of Article XXXIII, which changed the unanimity requirement by providing for decisions taken by a two-thirds majority, was added by the 1948 Protocol Modifying Certain Provisions, which entered into force on 15 April 1948.⁵² At the same time, Articles XXXV and XXV:5(b) were added; see section III under Article XXXV.

During the Review Session it was agreed to amend Article XXXIII to provide that the terms of accession would be agreed between the acceding government and the Organization for Trade Cooperation, and that the acceding government would be required to accept the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation; the amended Article XXXIII would also have clarified the majority requirement for accession decisions. The provisions on accession on behalf of a separate customs territory would have been moved into an interpretative note.⁵³ However, these amendments were contained in the Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement, which did not enter into force.

The annexes to this Agreement are hereby made an integral part of this Agreement.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXIV

Article XXXIV was inserted during the negotiation of the text of the General Agreement at Geneva in 1947, to give the Interpretative Notes (Annex I) the same legal value as the provisions of the Agreement.¹ The Havana Charter also included Interpretative Notes which were negotiated concurrently with the Charter text, and an Article (105) corresponding to Article XXXIV.² At the Review Session of 1954-55 it was agreed to amend the title of Annex I to read "Notes and Supplementary Provisions". This amendment was effected through the Protocol amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, which entered into force on 7 October 1957.

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXXV

Article XXXV

Non-application of the Agreement between particular Contracting Parties

1. This Agreement, or alternatively Article II of this Agreement, shall not apply as between any contracting party and any other contracting party if:

- (a) the two contracting parties have not entered into tariff negotiations with each other, and
- (b) either of the contracting parties, at the time either becomes a contracting party, does not consent to such application.

2. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may review the operation of this Article in particular cases at the request of any contracting party and make appropriate recommendations.

I. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXV

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXV

1. Paragraph 1

(1) “entered into tariff negotiations”

At the Second Session in September 1948, in answer to a question whether the two conditions, in (a) and (b) of paragraph 1, were meant to be independent or cumulative, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES replied that “according to the paragraph, if two countries, one of which was a contracting party and the other of which was acceding to the General Agreement, had not entered into negotiations, either of them, the contracting party or the acceding party, could decide that the Agreement or Article II should not apply between them when the second party became a contracting party”.¹

The Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES ruled on 31 May 1949 during the round of trade negotiations held at Annecy that “delegations should be deemed to have entered into negotiations when they had held a first meeting scheduled by the Tariff Negotiations Working Party at which they had exchanged lists of offers”.² It was stated during the discussions leading to this ruling that “Article XXXV would only apply when negotiations had not been entered into. Any contracting party could avail itself of paragraph 5(b) of Article XXV when negotiations had been entered into but not satisfactorily concluded, and its case would be considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting jointly”.³

A 1965 Note by the Director-General on “The Application of Article XXXV in Relation to the Present Trade Negotiations” refers to the 1949 Chairman’s ruling, and notes that “In the case of two contracting parties which are not applying the GATT to each other by virtue of an earlier invocation of Article XXXV by one of them, the procedure in the past has been that the latter, unless it intended to withdraw its invocation of the Article, would not submit offers to the other. The ruling and the procedure ... are based on the earlier technique of tariff negotiation under which offers are made by each participant to other individual participants”. The Note discusses the application of Article XXXV in the Kennedy Round negotiations.⁴

The Torquay Protocol of 1951 included the Philippines as an acceding government. The United States invoked Article XXXV with respect to the Philippines, noting that it had not entered into tariff negotiations with the Philippines at Torquay, and citing US legislation which provided that no trade agreement should be concluded by the United States under the Trade Agreements Act so long as a 1946 agreement on trade and other matters between the two countries was in force.⁵ However, the Philippines did not sign the Torquay Protocol and acceded to the GATT in 1979.

The Report of the Working Party on “Accession of Romania” notes that “The representative of the United States said that under the legislation in force in his country, his Government would have to invoke Article XXXV of the General Agreement with regard to Romania. The United States could therefore not take part in negotiations on the Romanian import commitment; if the legislative situation changed, his Government might, however, at a later stage, after the accession of Romania to GATT, enter into negotiations with that country”.⁶

On 23 March 1994, the Council adopted the following Decision on “Interpretation of Article XXXV”:

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES,

“Having regard to the linked provisions of paragraph 1 of Article XXXV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade;

“Noting that by invoking Article XXXV a contracting party on the one hand, or a government acceding to the General Agreement on the other, declines to apply the General Agreement, or alternatively Article II of that Agreement, to the other party;

“Desiring to ensure that tariff negotiations between contracting parties and a government acceding to the General Agreement are not inhibited by unwillingness to accept an obligation to apply the General Agreement as a consequence of entry into such negotiations;

¹GATT/CP.2/SR.18, p. 4. The immediate context was the possibility of invoking Article XXXV in order to solve problems created for certain contracting parties by the insertion of the present text of Article XXIX:1.

“Decide as follows:

“A contracting party and a government acceding to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade may engage in negotiations relating to the establishment of a GATT schedule of concessions by the acceding government without prejudice to the right of either to invoke Article XXXV in respect of the other.”⁷

(2) “or alternatively Article II of this Agreement”

All past invocations of Article XXXV have related to the non-application of the General Agreement and not only of its Article II under the alternate clause of Article XXXV:1.

2. Paragraph 2: “review the operation of this Article”

When Article XXXV was drafted at the First Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1948, the second paragraph of Article XXXV was proposed by the United Kingdom representative.⁸ It was stated in the course of the discussion that “the draft was designed to provide for those cases where a party felt it had received inequitable treatment at the hands of another”.⁹

In 1961 the CONTRACTING PARTIES reviewed the operation of Article XXXV with respect to Japan¹⁰ and in December 1961 adopted the Report of the Working Party on “Article XXXV - Application to Japan”.¹¹ The extent of invocation of Article XXXV with respect to Japan was discussed on many occasions by the contracting parties during the decade following the accession of Japan.

3. Relationship between Article XXXV and other GATT Articles

(1) Article XXXIII

In 1951, Cuba declared that it was voting for the accession of several countries but invoking Article XXXV against them.¹² Also in 1951, the United States voted in favour of the accession of the Philippines while invoking Article XXXV.¹³ Although 14 of the 33 contracting parties in 1955 invoked Article XXXV with respect to Japan, Japan obtained a two-thirds majority in favour of its accession.

During Council discussion of Romania’s application of accession to GATT in October 1971, “The Chairman confirmed that there was nothing in the rules of the GATT which would prevent a contracting party from voting in favour of a decision pursuant to Article XXXIII, even if it did not consent to apply the General Agreement to the newly acceding country in accordance with Article XXXV”.¹⁴

(2) Article XXVI:5

In a number of instances, governments have invoked or disinvoked Article XXXV in respect of territories for which they had international responsibility at the time and in respect of which they had agreed to apply provisionally the General Agreement under paragraph 2 of the Protocol of Provisional Application.¹⁵

The Report of the Working Party on “Article XXXV - Application to Japan” discussed the question of the invocation of Article XXXV by governments assuming in their own right the status of contracting parties pursuant to Article XXVI:5(c). The Report provides that “... if Article XXXV had been invoked in respect of that territory (or if that territory had not been specifically excluded from such an invocation), it would continue to be valid unless expressly disinvoked by the succeeding government".¹⁶

(3) Part IV

At the Second Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1964, the representative of Japan informed the CONTRACTING PARTIES that his Government would not be in a position to assume legally any obligations arising from Part IV with respect to those contracting parties which, through the invocation of Article XXXV, were not applying the General Agreement to Japan.¹⁷

The Declaration of 27 September 1951 on “Suspension of Obligations between Czechoslovakia and the United States under the Agreement”¹⁸, which does not refer to Article XXXV, provided that the CONTRACTING PARTIES declare “that the Governments of the United States and Czechoslovakia shall be free to suspend, each with respect to the other, the obligations of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade”, and “Affirm that any measures which may be taken either by the United States or by Czechoslovakia shall not in any way modify the obligations of that Government under the General Agreement towards the other contracting parties”.¹⁹ At the Council meeting of November 1992:

“The representative of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic ... recalled that in their Declaration of 27 September 1951 ... the CONTRACTING PARTIES had stated that the Governments of Czechoslovakia and the United States were free to suspend, with respect to each other, obligations under the General Agreement. Since the reasons for the suspension of obligations between the two Governments had ceased to exist, his Government believed that the suspension was no longer desirable. The Czech and Slovak Federal Republic would therefore consider GATT obligations between the two Governments as being fully restored from 3 November, which would be confirmed by an exchange of letters between them. He expressed his Government's satisfaction that after more than forty years this abnormal situation had finally been resolved, and that normal trade relations respecting the GATT would be restored between the two countries. He asked the Council to take note that the 1951 Declaration was no longer in effect.

“The representative of the United States confirmed that the United States and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic had agreed to exchange letters stating that they no longer desired to invoke the suspension of GATT obligations in respect of each other. Accordingly, the United States considered that the CONTRACTING PARTIES' Declaration of 27 September 1951 allowing the two Governments to suspend with respect to each other obligations under the General Agreement, was no longer operative. It was unfortunate that circumstances had been such that for more than forty years it had been necessary to engage in a mutual suspension of GATT obligations. The United States was gratified that it was now in a position to restore GATT relations with the Czech and Slovak Republic, and asked the Council to take note of the end of this suspension of GATT obligations. This action was without prejudice to whether either Government would, in the future, maintain GATT obligations with respect to new states emerging from each other's current territories.

“The Council took note of the statements and also that the CONTRACTING PARTIES' 1951 Declaration on the suspension of obligations between the United States and Czechoslovakia ... was no longer operative.”²⁰

III. PREPARATORY WORK

The text of the General Agreement as of 30 October 1947 provided for accession by unanimous vote, and consequently contained no provision equivalent or similar to Article XXXV.

At the First Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which took place during the Havana Conference in early 1948, it was agreed to amend Article XXXIII to change the unanimity rule for accession to a two-thirds majority, and to add Article XXXV.

The substance of paragraph 1 appeared first as a proviso in the new draft for Article XXXIII.²¹ It was stated that the amendment of Article XXXIII from unanimity to a two-thirds majority “gives rise to certain problems of relations between the new contracting party and those old contracting parties with which no negotiations have taken place, and to meet these difficulties alternative provisos have been inserted”.²² It was also pointed out that such a safeguard was necessary, otherwise “two thirds of the contracting parties would oblige a contracting party to enter a trade agreement with another country without its consent".²³ A new draft was then suggested to become a new Article XXXV.²⁴

In the same discussions, it was also agreed to add Article XXV:5(b) through (d), which permitted the CONTRACTING PARTIES to authorize one contracting party to withhold the benefit of concessions in its Schedule from another contracting party in certain circumstances; see supra Article XXV.²⁵ These changes were summarized by one of their drafters during discussions on accession at Annecy:

"It had been realized at Havana that the original Article XXXIII of GATT, which required a unanimous decision with respect to accession had actually given a veto power to each of the contracting parties. This was remedied by the adoption of the provision for a decision by a two-thirds majority. However, the effect of this amendment could have been to coerce a contracting party to reach a trade agreement against its will. The balance had been redressed by the insertion of the new Article XXXV and by the ability of a contracting party to utilize paragraph 5(b) of Article XXV".²⁶

These changes were implemented by the 1948 Protocol Modifying Certain Provisions of the General Agreement, which entered into force on 24 March 1948.

At the 1955 Review Session, it was agreed to delete Article XXV:5(b), which had never been invoked, and as a consequential amendment to delete the words "without prejudice to the provisions of paragraph 5(b) of Article XXV" from Article XXXV.²⁷ This deletion was effected through the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement, which entered into force on 7 October 1957.

I. TEXT OF INTERPRETATIVE NOTE AD PART IV

Interpretative Note Ad Part IV from Annex I

The words “developed contracting parties” and the words “less-developed contracting parties” as used in Part IV are to be understood to refer to developed and less-developed countries which are parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF PART IV

A. GENERAL

The CONTRACTING PARTIES at their Twelfth Session decided to appoint a Panel of Experts to report on trends in international trade, “in particular the failure of the trade of less developed countries to develop as rapidly as that of industrialized countries, excessive short-term fluctuations in prices of primary products, and widespread resort to agricultural protection”.¹ The Report on “Trends in International Trade” was submitted and discussed at the Thirteenth Session²; the CONTRACTING PARTIES then decided to initiate consideration of a plan of action and established three committees of which Committee III had the mandate “to consider and report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES regarding other measures for the expansion of trade, with particular reference to the importance of the maintenance and expansion of the export earnings of the less developed countries to the development and diversification of their economies”.³ A Declaration on “Promotion of the Trade of Less-Developed Countries” was adopted by Ministers on 30 November 1961 and by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 7

December 1961.⁴ The Decision on “Implementation of Conclusions of Ministers” established a programme of further work in Committee III.⁵

The Conclusions and Resolutions adopted at the Ministerial meeting on 21 May 1963 initiated negotiations on an amendment of the General Agreement to introduce a Part IV. In discussing measures for the expansion of trade of developing countries as a means of furthering their economic development: “The Ministers recognized the need for an adequate legal and institutional framework to enable the CONTRACTING PARTIES to discharge their responsibilities in connection with the work of expanding the trade of the less-developed countries”. A Committee on the Legal and Institutional Framework of GATT in Relation to Less-Developed Countries was established to undertake further work in this connection, under the oversight of the Action Committee.⁶ The Committee on Legal and Institutional Framework drafted a new Chapter on Trade and Development for inclusion in the General Agreement.⁷

At the Second Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, on 8 February 1965, the Chairman, in presenting for approval the Protocol Introducing Part IV on Trade and Development, made the following statement:

“This new Part showed clearly that the promotion of the trade of less-developed countries and the provision of increased access for their products in world markets, were among the primary objectives of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. These objectives were now set forth in a new Article XXXVI. Article XXXVII laid down the commitments in the field of commercial policy which contracting parties would accept in order to promote these objectives. Article XXXVIII provided for joint action by the contracting parties, both within the framework of the GATT and in collaboration with other intergovernmental bodies, to further the objectives.”⁸

The Protocol Amending the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to Introduce a Part IV on Trade and Development, which was done on 8 February 1965, entered into force on 27 June 1966.⁹ The time-limit for acceptance of the Protocol was extended annually by decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES until the close of their thirty-fifth session in 1979¹⁰, when the Protocol had been accepted by all contracting parties. Acceptances by some contracting parties were accompanied by Declarations.¹¹

In the Committee on Legal and Institutional Framework, one developing country proposed the inclusion of the following commitments by contracting parties:

“in establishing their agricultural policies for the maintenance of agricultural income, to avoid restrictive measures that limit imports of raw or processed products of particular interest to less-developed countries and inhibit their consumption”;

“to adjust and moderate agricultural protective measures, in order to facilitate exports of agricultural products by less-developed countries”.

However, it was agreed that instead of including specific provisions in Part IV, a statement on this subject by the Chairman should be included in the record of the second special session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES at which agreement was finally reached on the text of Part IV.¹² This statement, after having noted that the importance of trade in agricultural products had been stressed in the Committee and a specific proposal had been discussed, observed that the CONTRACTING PARTIES had agreed to seek solutions to problems of agricultural trade in the course of the Kennedy Round and had agreed that in these trade negotiations every effort would be made to lower barriers to exports from developing countries. It concluded with the following paragraph:

“Although a specific paragraph to cover all the specific concerns expressed by those less-developed contracting parties particularly interested in agricultural trade problems has not been included in Part IV, agricultural products are covered by the general provisions of Part IV. However, it is understood that at a later stage and in the light of the forthcoming trade negotiations, interested contracting parties will be entitled to revert to this matter in the Committee on Trade and Development.”¹³

At the Fiftieth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in December 1994, the Chairman of the Committee on Trade Development summed up the conclusions of a debate held at the Committee’s session in November 1994, which had addressed the substantive issue of the participation of developing countries in the international trading system by focusing on whether developing countries had recently increased their share in world trade and whether international trade had contributed to their economic growth.

“Ten main conclusions emerged from the debate: (1) The developing countries’ percentage share in world trade had been growing. (2) This growth had been uneven: the least-developed countries, and recently Africa, had seen a decrease in their share in trade, while other regions, such as South-East Asia, had significantly increased their share. (3) This had resulted as much from domestic policies as from the general international environment, since these different trends could not be attributed to the international environment alone. (4) The Uruguay Round had represented a significant opportunity for developing countries to increase their share in trade, because of the integration of sectors previously outside the GATT system (such as agriculture and textiles) into WTO rules, and because the Round had dealt with internal policies (and not just border measures) that restricted trade. (5) Therefore future participation of developing countries in world trade would be determined by the effectiveness with which the Uruguay Round agreements would be implemented. (6) Though participation in world trade of both developing and developed countries had increased in the past twenty years, the opposite had occurred for the former Socialist states, which seemed to indicate the importance of market forces, or a reduction of State intervention, for trade development. (7) Product composition of the trade of developing countries had been important, as the substantial rise in trade of manufactures had been the key to the increased participation of some of these countries. The growth of intra-regional trade had also been relevant. (8) It was important to make an examination of changes and to see whether higher or lower hindrances to trade in recent years could explain the developing countries’ share in world trade. (9) In future, developing countries would make greater commitments in the WTO, and in this context all WTO members should note that developing countries accounted for 25 per cent of world trade. (10) Finally, it was necessary to integrate the autonomous liberalization measures taken by developing countries into the multilateral system aimed at facilitating, promoting and liberalizing trade.”¹⁴

B. “DEVELOPED” AND “LESS-DEVELOPED” CONTRACTING PARTIES

The Interpretative Note Ad Part IV provides that these expressions refer to developed and less-developed countries which are parties to the General Agreement.

The Decision of 28 November 1979 on “Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries” notes: “The words ‘developing countries’ as used in this text are to be understood to refer also to developing territories”.¹⁵

The 1964 Committee on Legal and Institutional Framework had discussed the problems concerned with identifying the less-developed contracting parties and defining the term “less-developed contracting party”. Two main views emerged in the Committee:

“On the one hand, some members considered that it was not at this stage either necessary or feasible to attempt a definition of a less-developed contracting party and that if a problem as to identification arose such a problem could be dealt with at that time. On the other hand, some members felt that it was possible by a systematic identification of either less-developed contracting parties or developed contracting parties to resolve the matter at a later stage.”¹⁶

The terms of reference of the Committee on Trade and Development include: “to consider any questions which may arise as to the eligibility of a contracting party to be considered as a less-developed contracting party in the sense of Part IV ...”.¹⁷

C. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PART IV AND OTHER GATT ARTICLES

1. General

The Panel Report of 1989 on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile” concluded that the EEC import restrictions at issue were inconsistent with Articles XI and XIII. After finding that these restrictions were inconsistent with Article XI, the Panel examined Chile’s claim under Part IV, noting generally as follows:

“... the Panel noted that the commitments entered into by contracting parties under Article XXXVII were additional to their obligations under Parts I-III of the General Agreement, and that these commitments thus applied to measures which were permitted under Parts I-III. As the Panel had found the EEC’s import restrictions to be inconsistent with specific obligations of the EEC under Part II of the General Agreement, it therefore did not consider it necessary to pursue the matter further under Article XXXVII.”¹⁸

When the text of Part IV was submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for approval in November 1964, the Chairman said: “it was well known that many less-developed countries had hoped to have provisions relating to preferences in the new text. This had not been possible, but the CONTRACTING PARTIES had agreed to a working procedure for dealing with this important and controversial issue”.¹⁹

A summary of the discussions during the drafting of Part IV as to the relation of Part IV to Article I appears under Article XXXVII infra. For the waivers granted in respect of the Generalized System of Preferences on 25 June 1971²⁰ and in respect of trade negotiations among developing countries on 26 November 1971²¹, see under Article I. See also the material under Article I on the Decision on “Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries” of 28 November 1979 (the “Enabling Clause”).²²

In the Working Party on “United Kingdom Temporary Import Charges” in 1964-66, less-developed countries urged the United Kingdom to exempt from the charges products of which they were the principal suppliers and products which had social implications in their countries (e.g. hand-made products and products of cottage industries). They considered that such exemption would be “fully in accord with the spirit of the new Part IV”. “Without prejudice to the principle of non-discrimination as embodied in the General Agreement”, the Working Party felt that any such special treatment which the United Kingdom might feel able to give “should not be considered by other trading partners as creating a justification for them to press for special treatment for their own trade”.²³ The United States dissented from this view. Further concerning the application of import surcharges to exports of developing countries, see also the material under Article XII in this Index on the relationship between Article XII and Articles I and XIII.

The Report of the Working Party on the "Trade Arrangement between India, the United Arab Republic and Yugoslavia" which examined the Trade Expansion and Economic Co-operation Agreement between India, United Arab Republic and Yugoslavia in 1968, recorded opposing views concerning the relationship between Part IV and Article I. Several representatives, while recognizing the importance of Part IV, considered that "it did not override the obligations of other parts of the General Agreement". In their view the Tripartite Agreement "was inconsistent with the basic most-favoured-nation provision of Article I". The representatives of the three participating countries considered that "the Agreement was in pursuance of their obligations under Part IV and consistent with the spirit of the General Agreement".²⁴ Similar differences of view are mentioned in the 1973 Report of the Working Party on "Trade Arrangements between India, the Arab Republic of Egypt and Yugoslavia".²⁵ Similar differences of view were expressed in the 1977 Report of the Working Party on the "First Agreement on Trade Negotiations Among Developing Member Countries of the Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific - Bangkok Agreement".²⁶ See material on this agreement under Article I.

The 1973 Interim Panel Report on "United Kingdom - Dollar Area Quotas" sets out, among the "Considerations of the Panel":

"The Panel noted the contention of the United States delegation that the restrictions were in contravention of Articles XI and XIII of the General Agreement and that delegation's request that the restrictions be eliminated. The Panel also noted that the United Kingdom had never denied that the Dollar Area Quotas were in formal contravention of the provisions of the General Agreement on quantitative restrictions, and for the time being reserved its findings on this question. The Panel noted as well the argument put forward by the Caribbean countries and territories that the restrictions must be viewed in the context of the General Agreement as a whole and with particular regard to Part IV of the Agreement. According to these delegations, the continued application of the quotas was justified in the light of Part IV which was designed to deal with the special circumstances of developing countries."²⁷

The Panel Report on the same matter notes the withdrawal of the complaint and refrains from pronouncing on the interpretation of Part IV.²⁸

The Report of the Committee on Trade and Development in 1976 notes the view of a developed contracting party that Part IV does not require the exempting of products originating in developing countries from temporary import restrictions administered on a most-favoured-nation basis in accordance with Article XIII.²⁹

The 1980 Panel Report on "Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Certain Textile Products" concludes that Norway's import restrictions were inconsistent with Article XIII. The Panel also concludes: "In the case before the Panel, Norway had in early 1978 concluded long-term bilateral arrangements with six textile-supplying countries. ... for these arrangements no derogation or provision of Parts I-III of GATT had ever been invoked by Norway. While noting that provision for some developing exporting countries of assured increase in access to Norway's textile and clothing markets might be consistent for those countries with the spirit and objectives of Part IV of the GATT, this cannot be cited as justification for actions which would be inconsistent with a country's obligations under Part II of the GATT".³⁰

The 1984 Panel Report on "United States - Imports of Sugar from Nicaragua" found the United States sugar quota to be inconsistent with Article XIII. The Panel Report notes that "having found the quota reduction to be inconsistent with a specific obligation of the United States under Part II of the General Agreement, the Panel saw no need to pursue the question whether the action was also contrary to the United States' more general commitments under Part IV".³¹ In discussion on this panel report in the GATT Council, "several representatives

In this connection see also the unadopted panel reports of 1993 and 1994 respectively on “EEC - Member States’ Import Regimes for Bananas”³³ and “EEC - Import Regime for Bananas”.³⁴

3. Article III

The 1970 Report of the Working Party on “Border Tax Adjustments” notes that “Some members pointed out that the question of forward shifting of internal taxes on domestic products did not arise in the case of products which were not domestically produced by developed countries. They therefore emphasized that the destination principle regarding tax adjustments was not relevant in the case of products of export interest to developing countries which were not produced in developed countries, and that in order to ensure trade neutrality as required under GATT rules no internal taxes should be levied by developed countries on such products.

“Members from developing countries drew attention to the Ministerial Conclusions of 1963 and Article XXVII of the GATT, which stressed that developed contracting parties should endeavour to suppress taxes on products imported essentially from developing countries. ...

“In referring to the proposal to suppress taxes on products not produced in developed countries, some countries considered that it was of great importance not to introduce into fiscal policies considerations and preoccupations relating to trade policy.”³⁵

The Report of the Working Party on the “Accession of Costa Rica” includes a discussion of Costa Rica’s selective consumption levy. Some members of the Working Party stated that “neither Part IV nor Article XVIII of the General Agreement authorized the discriminatory application of levies contrary to Article III”.³⁶

4. Article XVI

The Report of the Working Party on a 1967 consultation under Article XXII:2 on the “United States Subsidy on Unmanufactured Tobacco” discusses the application of Part IV in relation to an export subsidy of a developed country competing with a developing country. See further under Article XXXVI:3 and Article XXVII:3. The Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES noted “that the report of the Working Party contained no conclusive indication as regards damage to the trade interests of other tobacco producers arising from the existence of the United States subsidy. However, as it appeared that, to some extent, the provisions of Part IV were involved and as it was conceivable that the trade interests of other producers could be affected”, he suggested, and it was so agreed, that CONTRACTING PARTIES urge the United States to give sympathetic and urgent consideration to the requests made by certain members of the Working Party.³⁷ These members had requested that the US remove the subsidy and consult before taking action to extend the existing subsidy.³⁸

In the panel proceeding on “European Communities - Refunds on Exports of Sugar - Complaint by Brazil,” Brazil argued, inter alia, that the Community system and its application were inconsistent with commitments under Part IV of the General Agreement, in particular Article XXXVI:2, 3, 4 and 9, and XXXVII:2(a) and (e).³⁹ The EC representative argued that “the provisions of Article XXXVI constituted principles and objectives and could not be understood to establish precise, specific obligations.”⁴⁰ The conclusions provide:

“The Panel recognized the efforts made by the European Communities in complying with the provisions of Articles XXXVI and XXXVIII. It nevertheless felt that increased Community exports of sugar through the use of subsidies in the particular market situation in 1978 and 1979, and where developing contracting parties had taken steps within the framework of the [International Sugar Agreement] to improve the conditions in the world sugar market, inevitably reduced the effects of the efforts made by these countries. For this time-period and for this particular field, the European Communities had therefore not collaborated jointly with other contracting parties to further the principles and objectives set forth in Article XXXVI, in conformity with the guidelines given in Article XXXVIII.”⁴¹

See further material from this Panel Report under Article XXXVI.

5. Article XVII

Article XXXVII:3(a) provides: “The developed contracting parties shall: (a) make every effort, in cases where a government directly or indirectly determines the resale price of products wholly or mainly produced in the territories of less-developed contracting parties, to maintain trade margins at equitable levels”.

6. Article XIX

The drafting history of Part IV of the General Agreement indicates that an escape clause action would fall within paragraph 1(b) of Article XXXVII.⁴² In 1971-72, after the introduction of Part IV, the Committee on Trade and Development discussed whether it was necessary to re-examine Article XIX in this new context.⁴³ Some delegations from developing countries proposed that for equity reasons and in light of Part IV imports from developing countries should be exempted from the scope of action under Article XIX.⁴⁴ Representatives of several developed countries stated, inter alia, that to require the discriminatory use of this Article might in fact encourage the use of quantitative restrictions and limit the ability of contracting parties to accept commitments for trade liberalization. One of these representatives felt that “serious injury” would be among the “compelling reasons” mentioned in Article XXXVII and this would place Article XIX situations outside the scope of paragraph 1(b) of the Article. A 1976 Secretariat Note on the application of Part IV of the General Agreement mentions that “some developed countries stated that they could not accept that Part IV allowed a departure from the principle of non-discrimination with regard to Article XIX, which ought to be applied across the board on a most-favoured-nation basis”.⁴⁵

7. Article XXXV

At the Second Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1975, the representative of Japan informed the CONTRACTING PARTIES that his Government would not be in a position to assume legally any obligations arising from Part IV with respect to those contracting parties which, through the invocation of Article XXXV, were not applying the General Agreement to Japan.⁴⁶

D. COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND DEVELOPMENT

At their meeting on 26 November 1964, the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided that the Committee on Trade and Development should be established with the following terms of reference:

“1. To keep under continuous review the application of the provisions of Part IV of the General Agreement.

“2. To carry out, or arrange for, any consultation which may be required in the application of the provisions of Part IV.

“3. To formulate proposals for consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in connection with any matter relating to the furtherance of the provisions of Part IV.

“4. To consider any questions which may arise as to the eligibility of a contracting party to be considered as a less-developed contracting party in the sense of Part IV and to report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

“5. To consider, on the basis of proposals referred to it by the CONTRACTING PARTIES for examination, whether modification of or additions to Part IV are required to further the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the field of trade and development and to make appropriate recommendations.

“6. To carry out such additional functions as may be assigned to the Committee by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.”⁴⁷

The Committee also took over the functions of Committee III, of the Action Committee and its subsidiary bodies, and of the Working Party on Preferences.

The Committee was also given a mandate to deal with outstanding issues relating to the amendment of the General Agreement which had not been finished by the Committee on Legal and Institutional Framework, including: (a) a review of Article XVIII, taking into account an Australian proposal⁴⁸; (b) a review of Article XXIII, in the light of experience of its operation and taking into consideration the proposal by Brazil and Uruguay; and other proposals put forward by contracting parties; and (c) a proposal relating to the imposition of import surcharges by less-developed contracting parties to safeguard their balance of payments.⁴⁹ The work on Article XXIII resulted in the Decision of 5 April 1966 on Procedures under Article XXIII, for disputes between less-developed and developed contracting parties. The text of these Procedures and material on their drafting and application appears under Article XXIII in this Index. The work on import surcharges did not have an immediate result; see the material on import surcharges under Articles XVIII and XII. Generally concerning this work, see the reports and documents of the Committee.⁵⁰

The GATT Work Programme of 1979 provided:

“The rôle of the Committee on Trade and Development should be strengthened and should cover, inter alia,

“1. work on trade policy and development policies including trade liberalization in areas of special interest to developing countries;

“2. primary responsibility for supervision of the implementation of points 1 and 4 of the ‘Framework’ texts;

“3. examination of protective action by developed countries against imports from developing countries;

“4. work on structural adjustment and trade of developing countries; and

In December 1994, the Preparatory Committee for the World Trade Organization agreed to new terms of reference, as follows, for the Committee on Trade and Development to be established under the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization:

- “1. To serve as a focal point for consideration and coordination of work on development in the World Trade Organization (WTO) and its relationship to development-related activities in other multilateral agencies.”⁵³
- “2. To keep under continuous review the participation of developing country Members in the multilateral trading system and to consider measures and initiatives to assist developing country Members, and in particular the least-developed country Members, in the expansion of their trade and investment opportunities, including support for their measures of trade liberalization.”⁵⁴
- “3. To review periodically, in consultation as appropriate with the relevant bodies of the WTO, the application of special provisions in the Multilateral Trade Agreements and related Ministerial Decisions in favour of developing country Members, and in particular least-developed country Members, and report to the General Council for appropriate action.
- “4. To consider any questions which may arise with regard to either the application or the use of special provisions in the Multilateral Trade Agreements and related Ministerial Decisions in favour of developing country Members and report to the General Council for appropriate action.
- “5. To provide guidelines for, and to review periodically, the technical cooperation activities of the WTO”⁵⁵ as they relate to developing country Members.
- “6. The Committee will establish a programme of work which may be reviewed as necessary each year.”⁵⁶

A Decision adopted on 8 December 1994 by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and by the Preparatory Committee for the WTO, on “Transitional Arrangements - Avoidance of Procedural and Institutional Duplication” provides inter alia that

“In the period between the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement and the date of the termination of the legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 and of the Tokyo Round Agreements the following notification and coordination procedures shall apply under the GATT 1947, the Tokyo Round Agreements and the WTO Agreement:

- “2. The coordination procedures set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 below shall apply in the relations between the bodies referred to in sub-paragraphs (a) to (d) below:

- “3. The bodies established under the GATT 1947 or a Tokyo Round Agreement that are referred to in paragraph 2 above shall hold their meetings jointly or consecutively, as appropriate, with the corresponding WTO bodies. competent bodies established under the GATT 1947, the Tokyo Round Agreements and the WTO Agreement.

- “4. The coordination of activities in accordance with paragraph 3 above shall be conducted in a manner which ensures that the enjoyment of the rights and the performance of the obligations under the GATT 1947, the Tokyo Round Agreements and the WTO Agreement and the exercise of the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT 1947, the Committees established under the Tokyo Round Agreements and the bodies of the WTO are unaffected.”⁵⁷

The WTO General Council at its first meeting on 31 January 1995 established the Committee on Trade and Development with the terms of reference decided by the Preparatory Committee.⁵⁸

1. Review of implementation of Part IV and operation of the Enabling Clause

In order to enable the Committee on Trade and Development to keep under continuous review the application of the provisions of Part IV, the Committee agreed, in March 1965, on Reporting Procedures.⁵⁹ The Committee on Trade and Development also adopted Guidelines for the submission of notifications, the preparation of reports and the carrying out of reviews on the implementation of Part IV, which provide that notifications made by governments should be as exhaustive and comprehensive as possible and should relate both to measures specifically mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3, or paragraph 4, as the case may be of Article XXXVII, as well as to all steps and measures of interest to the CONTRACTING PARTIES in relation to the objectives and provisions of Part IV.⁶⁰ Every year the Secretariat issues an airgram inviting contracting parties to make the relevant information available.

The reviews of the implementation of Part IV are a regular feature of the sessions of the Committee on Trade and Development. They take the form of reviews of and discussions on notifications submitted by governments on measures taken in the implementation of Part IV commitments, discussion of reports of the Sub-Committees of the Committee, and discussion of Secretariat reports on issues relevant to Part IV and the Enabling Clause.

The Committee on Trade and Development adopted Procedures for the elimination of import restrictions affecting the exports of developing countries, on 21 November 1967.⁶¹

Procedures for “Consultations Concerning the Implementation of Provisions of Part IV” were adopted by the Committee on Trade and Development on 23 March 1970 as well as by the CONTRACTING PARTIES at their Twenty-sixth Session in April 1971.⁶² However, these consultation procedures have never been utilized.

In January 1971, the Committee on Trade and Development established a “Group of Three”, which was requested to present proposals, inter alia, for the fuller implementation of the provisions of Part IV. The Group presented three reports⁶³. With the recognition that the Tokyo Round multilateral trade negotiations were expected to deal, inter alia, with the trade problems of developing countries in accordance with the provisions of the Tokyo Declaration, the Committee on Trade and Development agreed at its meeting in October 1973, that the work of the Group could be suspended for the time being.⁶⁴

The Decision of 28 November 1979 on “Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries”⁶⁵ (widely referred to as the “Enabling Clause”) provides in its paragraphs 1 and 4:

“1. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article I of the General Agreement, contracting parties may accord differential and more favourable treatment to developing countries, without according such treatment to other contracting parties.”

“4. Any contracting party taking action to introduce an arrangement pursuant to paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 above or subsequently taking action to introduce modification or withdrawal of the differential and more favourable treatment so provided shall:

“(a) notify the CONTRACTING PARTIES and furnish them with all the information they may deem appropriate relating to such action;

“(b) afford adequate opportunity for prompt consultations at the request of any interested contracting party with respect to any difficulty or matter that may arise. The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall, if requested to do so by such contracting party, consult with all contracting parties concerned with respect to the matter with a view to reaching solutions satisfactory to all such contracting parties.”⁶⁶

As noted above, the Committee on Trade and Development was given primary responsibility for the supervision of these two paragraphs.

The GATT Ministerial Declaration adopted on 29 November 1982, includes a decision and annex on “GATT Rules and Activities Relating to Developing Countries”⁶⁷, in which the CONTRACTING PARTIES, inter alia

“1. Decide, in order to improve the review and surveillance procedures in regard to the implementation of Part IV, that:

“(a) the Committee on Trade and Development, bearing in mind particularly the special responsibility of the developed contracting parties in this regard, shall adopt a programme of consultations with contracting parties individually or collectively, as appropriate, to examine how individual contracting parties have responded to the requirements of Part IV;

“(b) each such consultation shall be based on information supplied by the contracting party or parties in question and additional factual material prepared by the secretariat;

“(c) the Committee on Trade and Development shall also examine other aspects of existing procedures for reviewing the implementation of Part IV and for dealing with problems relating to the application of its provisions, and prepare guidelines for their improvement.

“2. Invite the Committee on Trade and Development to review the operation of the Enabling Clause as provided for in its paragraph 9, with a view to its more effective implementation, inter alia, with respect to objectivity and transparency of modifications to GSP schemes and the operation of consultative provisions relating to differential and more favourable treatment for developing countries; ...”⁶⁸

Information on these consultations is provided in the reports and proceedings of the Committee on Trade and Development.

2. Sub-Committee on Trade of Least-Developed Countries

In July 1980, the Committee on Trade and Development established the Sub-Committee on Trade of Least-Developed Countries with the following terms of reference:

“In the light of paragraph 6 of the Tokyo Declaration, to give special attention to the particular situation and trade problems of the least-developed among the developing countries in GATT’s work programme following the Tokyo Round, including that relating to the results of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations, and to keep under review the special treatment which could be accorded these countries in the context of any general or specific measures taken in favour of developing countries, ... [and to] ... report to the Committee on Trade and Development”.⁷⁰

Up to December 1994 the Sub-Committee had held fifteen meetings.⁷¹

See also the Secretariat Note of 3 November 1994 on the provisions concerning least-developed countries in the Uruguay Round agreements, legal instruments and Ministerial Decisions.⁷²

3. Sub-Committee on Protective Measures

In the Decision on “Examination of Protective Measures Affecting Imports from Developing Countries” of 28 November 1979, the CONTRACTING PARTIES, inter alia, “Decide that the Committee on Trade and Development establish a Sub-Committee to examine any case of future protective action by developed countries against imports from developing countries in the light of relevant provisions of the GATT, particularly Part IV thereof.

“This examination shall be without prejudice to the rights of contracting parties under the GATT or the competence of other GATT bodies.

“The membership of the Sub-Committee shall be open to all contracting parties. Developing countries not contracting parties to GATT may, upon notification to the Director-General of GATT, participate in the proceedings of the Sub-Committee in an observer capacity.

“The Sub-Committee will report on such examination to the Committee on Trade and Development and through it to the Council.

“These arrangements will be reviewed and revised as appropriate”.⁷³

The Sub-Committee on Protective Measures which was established in accordance with the above Decision on “Protective Measures” in March 1980 held eight sessions up to the end of 1985.⁷⁴ In November 1986 the Committee on Trade and Development decided that with the start of the Uruguay Round the Sub-Committee should remain on call, to be activated as and when the Committee should deem it necessary.⁷⁵

E. TECHNICAL COOPERATION AND TRAINING ACTIVITIES

The Committee on Trade and Development reviews periodically the technical cooperation programme of the Secretariat. Paragraph H.2 of the 1989 Decision on Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures provides that “The Secretariat shall conduct special training courses for interested contracting parties concerning GATT dispute settlement procedures and practices so as to enable contracting parties’ experts to be better informed in this regard.”⁷⁷ The most recent such dispute settlement course took place in September 1994 for developing and developed contracting parties.

In addition, paragraph H.1 of the 1989 Decision provides that “the Secretariat shall make available a qualified legal expert within the Technical Cooperation Division to any developing contracting party which so requests”. Such assistance has been provided on a number of occasions since 1989.

Since 1955, the Secretariat has organized training courses in Geneva for government officials from developing countries (both contracting parties and others) involved in the formulation and development of trade policy. The courses deal with the theory and practice of trade policy and negotiations, including simulation exercises in dispute settlement and trade negotiations. In recent years courses have also been organized for officials of economies in transition.⁷⁸

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXXVI AND INTERPRETATIVE NOTE AD ARTICLE XXXVI

Article XXXVI

Principles and Objectives

- 1.* The contracting parties,
- (a) recalling that the basic objectives of this Agreement include the raising of standards of living and the progressive development of the economies of all contracting parties, and considering that the attainment of these objectives is particularly urgent for less-developed contracting parties;
 - (b) considering that export earnings of the less-developed contracting parties can play a vital part in their economic development and that the extent of this contribution depends on the prices paid by the less-developed contracting parties for essential imports, the volume of their exports, and the prices received for these exports;
 - (c) noting, that there is a wide gap between standards of living in less-developed countries and in other countries;
 - (d) recognizing that individual and joint action is essential to further the development of the economies of less-developed contracting parties and to bring about a rapid advance in the standards of living in these countries;
 - (e) recognizing that international trade as a means of achieving economic and social advancement should be governed by such rules and procedures _ and measures in conformity with such rules and procedures _ as are consistent with the objectives set forth in this Article;
 - (f) noting that the CONTRACTING PARTIES may enable less-developed contracting parties to use special measures to promote their trade and development;

agree as follows.

2. There is need for a rapid and sustained expansion of the export earnings of the less-developed contracting parties.

3. There is need for positive efforts designed to ensure that less-developed contracting parties secure a share in the growth in international trade commensurate with the needs of their economic development.

4. Given the continued dependence of many less-developed contracting parties on the exportation of a limited range of primary products,* there is need to provide in the largest possible measure more favourable and acceptable conditions of access to world markets for these products, and wherever appropriate to devise measures designed to stabilize and improve conditions of world markets in these products, including in particular measures designed to attain stable, equitable and remunerative prices, thus permitting an expansion of world trade and demand and a dynamic and steady growth of the real export earnings of these countries so as to provide them with expanding resources for their economic development.

5. The rapid expansion of the economies of the less-developed contracting parties will be facilitated by a diversification* of the structure of their economies and the avoidance of an excessive dependence on the export of primary products. There is, therefore, need for increased access in the largest possible measure to markets under favourable conditions for processed and manufactured products currently or potentially of particular export interest to less-developed contracting parties.

6. Because of the chronic deficiency in the export proceeds and other foreign exchange earnings of less-developed contracting parties, there are important inter-relationships between trade and financial assistance to development. There is, therefore, need for close and continuing collaboration between the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the international lending agencies so that they can contribute most effectively to alleviating the burdens these less-developed contracting parties assume in the interest of their economic development.

7. There is need for appropriate collaboration between the CONTRACTING PARTIES, other intergovernmental bodies and the organs and agencies of the United Nations system, whose activities relate to the trade and economic development of less-developed countries.

8. The developed contracting parties do not expect reciprocity for commitments made by them in trade negotiations to reduce or remove tariffs and other barriers to the trade of less-developed contracting parties.*

9. The adoption of measures to give effect to these principles and objectives shall be a matter of conscious and purposeful effort on the part of the contracting parties both individually and jointly.

Interpretative Note Ad Article XXXVI from Annex I

Paragraph 1

This Article is based upon the objectives set forth in Article I as it will be amended by Section A of paragraph 1 of the Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX when that Protocol enters into force.

Paragraph 4

The term “primary products” includes agricultural products, vide paragraph 2 of the note ad Article XVI, Section B.

Paragraph 5

A diversification programme would generally include the intensification of activities for the processing of primary products and the development of manufacturing industries, taking into account the situation of the particular contracting party and the world outlook for production and consumption of different commodities.

Paragraph 8

It is understood that the phrase “do not expect reciprocity” means, in accordance with the objectives set forth in this Article, that the less-developed contracting parties should not be expected, in the course of trade negotiations, to make contributions which are inconsistent with their individual development, financial and trade needs, taking into consideration past trade developments.

This paragraph would apply in the event of action under Section A of Article XVIII, Article XXVIII, Article XXVIII bis (Article XXIX after the amendment set forth in Section A of paragraph 1 of the Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX shall have become effective), Article XXXIII, or any other procedure under this Agreement.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXVI

1. General

The Panel Report on “European Communities - Refunds on Exports of Sugar - Complaint by Brazil” examined, inter alia, Brazil’s argument

“... that the Community system for granting refunds on exports of sugar and its application were inconsistent with commitments under Part IV of the General Agreement. The increased Community sugar exports effected through the use of subsidies, had severely depressed world market prices, and had displaced Brazilian exports and led to reduced sales opportunities and to reduced export earnings for Brazil, contrary to the provisions of Article XXXVI:2. By enlarging its market share, the European Communities had failed to make positive efforts as indicated in Article XXXVI:3, thus impeding that Brazil could be secured a share of the growth in international sugar trade compatible with its needs of economic developments. By refusing to participate in the International Sugar Agreement, 1977, and restricting its exports accordingly, the European Communities had seriously jeopardized the attainment of the objectives of that Agreement, contrary to the provisions of Article XXXVI:4. Furthermore, concerning sugar, the European Communities had not acted in a manner as to give effect to the implementation of the relevant principles and objectives contained in Article XXXVI, as stipulated in Article XXXVI:9. ...

“... the Community representative recalled the very considerable Community efforts made in favour of developing countries. These efforts comprised an innovative aid policy which through the STABEX system guaranteed export receipts for a number of least developed countries. In the field of primary commodities, the European Communities had always pursued an active and constructive policy towards the setting up of international agreements. With regard to Community participation in the International Sugar Agreement, 1977, there was no use in recalling the reasons for the present state of affairs.

“He furthermore argued that the provisions of Article XXXVI constituted principles and objectives and could not be understood to establish precise, specific obligations. It was therefore not possible by definition to ascertain that these principles had been infringed through the application of any specific measure. He also argued that it was not possible to imagine that the Community system of export refunds for sugar could have objectives contrary to those of Article XXXVI. Given the legal analogy between the provisions of Articles XXXVI and XXXVIII, the comments made in connexion with the former are also valid for the latter.”¹

The Panel findings provide in this regard:

“The Panel noted the principles and objectives stipulated in Article XXXVI and the guidelines for joint action given in Article XXXVIII to further the objectives set forth in Article XXXVI, and that Brazil being a developing country could expect to enjoy benefits in accordance with these provisions. In this connection, the Panel also noted that the European Communities had made considerable efforts in favour of a number of developing countries and had pursued an active and constructive policy towards the setting-up of international agreements.

“However, the Panel also noted that in the particular situation in the sugar market in 1978 and 1979, when Brazil and other developing countries took action through the ISA to improve the market situation, the European Communities increased its subsidized sugar exports to an extent that inevitably reduced significantly the effects of the measures taken by Brazil and other sugar exporters. It was evident that the magnitude of subsidized Community sugar exports together with the extensive use of maximum export refunds, tended to accentuate the detrimental effect on export earnings of other sugar exporters directly faced with the competition from Community sugar. The Panel felt that even though the European Communities was not a party to the ISA and not bound by the same obligations as members to that Agreement, it would nevertheless be appropriate to collaborate with other contracting parties in conformity with the guidelines given in Article XXXVIII and thus further the principles and objectives of Article XXXVI”.²

¹L/5011, adopted 10 November 1980, 27S/69, 79-80, paras. 2.25, 2.27-2.28.

The Panel concluded:

“The Panel recognized the efforts made by the European Communities in complying with the provisions of Articles XXXVI and XXXVIII. It nevertheless felt that increased Community exports of sugar through the use of subsidies in the particular market situation in 1978 and 1979, and where developing contracting parties had taken steps within the framework of the ISA to improve the conditions in the world sugar market, inevitably reduced the effects of the efforts made by these countries. For this time-period and for this particular field, the European Communities had therefore not collaborated jointly with other contracting parties to further the principles and objectives set forth in Article XXXVI, in conformity with the guidelines given in Article XXXVIII.”³

The 1989 Report of the Panel on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile” examined, inter alia, a claim by Chile “that in restricting imports of apples from Chile the Community had paid no regard to the special needs of Chile as a developing country as it was obliged to do under Part IV. It made no conscious and purposeful effort to ensure that Chile secure a share of growth in international trade in apples commensurate with the needs of its economic development. It did not provide in the largest possible measure more favourable and acceptable conditions of access to world markets for these products, as required under Article XXXVI”; and the argument of the EEC that “it did take these commitments seriously and that it made every effort to avoid having to take restrictive measures against a developing country ... Part IV did not, and could not, mean that the EEC should forego its rights or be obliged to discriminate against other contracting parties”.⁴ The Panel findings provide:

“The Panel examined the EEC measures in relation to the objectives and commitments embodied in Articles XXXVI and XXXVII of Part IV of the General Agreement ... The Panel found that the EEC's import measures on dessert apples did affect a product of particular export interest to less-developed contracting parties. It noted that the EEC had held consultations with affected suppliers and had amended its regulations, but these consultations and amendments had been general in scope and had not related specifically to the interests of less-developed contracting parties in terms of Part IV. Following a careful examination of this issue, the Panel could not find that the EEC had made appropriate efforts to avoid taking protective measures on apples originating in Chile. ...”⁵

2. Paragraph 1: “basic objectives of this Agreement”

As stated in the Note Ad Article XXXVI:1, the “basic objectives” referred to are those which would have been set forth in Article I of the General Agreement, if the Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX had entered into force. For the text of this amendment, see the chapter on the Preamble. The Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX failed to gain the requisite unanimous approval by 31 December 1967 and was abandoned.

3. Paragraph 3: “share in the growth of international trade”

The Report of the Working Party on a 1967 consultation under Article XXII:2 on the “United States Subsidy on Unmanufactured Tobacco” discusses the application of Article XXXVI in relation to an export subsidy of a developed country competing with a developing country. The Report notes that during the consultation Malawi suggested that Article XXXVI:3 “could be interpreted as meaning that the share of less-developed countries in world trade in a particular commodity could grow at a faster rate than world trade as a whole, and the rate of export growth by industrialized countries”.⁶

4. Paragraph 4: “primary products”

See also the corresponding provisions in Article XXXVIII:2(a). The Note Ad Article XXXVI:4 refers to the definition in paragraph 2 of the Note ad Section B of Article XVI. The definition of “primary product” in that paragraph is the same as the definition of “primary commodity” in Article 56:1 of the Havana Charter, which defined the scope of the Charter provisions on commodity agreements.

See also Articles XVIII:5, XX(h), XXII:2 and the material on them in this Index.

5. Paragraph 8: “do not expect reciprocity”

Conclusions reached at the meeting of Ministers of 27-30 November 1961 include the following: “... the Ministers agreed that, in view of the stage of economic development of the less-developed countries, a more flexible attitude should be taken with respect to the degree of reciprocity to be expected from these countries”.⁷

The Committee on Trade and Development discussed the interpretation of the provisions of paragraph 8 and of the Interpretative Note and the possibility of working out a priori rules for the application of the principle of non-reciprocity. Some developed countries stated in discussions on this question that they did not consider that Article XXXVI:8 relieved developing countries of their obligations under Article XXVIII to maintain a general level of concessions during renegotiations.⁸

In the GATT Council meeting of November 1975, the application of Article XXXVI:8 was discussed in connection with the request by Brazil for a waiver of Article II to the extent necessary to enable the Government of Brazil to apply the rates of duty in its new Customs Tariff, pending completion of renegotiation of its Schedule pursuant to Article XXVIII. The considerations stated by the contracting parties who participated in the discussion are summarized in the Council Minutes. In the light of the discussion, the preamble of the draft waiver was amended to recognise the desirability of maintaining a general level of mutually advantageous concessions that would favour high and expanding levels of trade, and the decision maintained a reference in the decision to Part IV of the General Agreement including Article XXXVI:8, as follows:

“Part IV of the General Agreement, including Article XXXVI:8, is applicable to the negotiations between Brazil and the contracting parties which have accepted the Protocol amending the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to introduce a Part IV on Trade and Development; and other contracting parties, negotiating with Brazil, likewise accept the principle enunciated in Article XXXVI:8, as applicable to the negotiations.”⁹

A number of other such Article II waiver decisions in the period 1973-1977 also included such a reference to Article XXXVI:8.¹⁰

See also the Decision of 28 November 1979 on “Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries”¹¹ whose paragraph 5 provides:

“The developed countries do not expect reciprocity for commitments made by them in trade negotiations to reduce or remove tariffs and other barriers to the trade of developing countries, i.e., the developed countries do not expect the developing countries, in the course of trade negotiations, to make contributions which are inconsistent with their individual development, financial and trade needs. Developed contracting parties shall therefore not seek, neither shall less-developed contracting parties be required to make, concessions that are inconsistent with the latters' development, financial and trade needs."¹²

Paragraph 6 sets out special provisions for the least-developed countries:

"Having regard to the special economic difficulties and the particular development, financial and trade needs of the least-developed countries, the developed countries shall exercise the utmost restraint in seeking any concessions or contributions for commitments made by them to reduce or remove tariffs and other barriers to the trade of such countries, and the least-developed countries shall not be expected to make concessions or contributions that are inconsistent with the recognition of their particular situation and problems."¹³

Paragraphs 7 and 8 provide:

"The concessions and contributions made and the obligations assumed by developed and less-developed contracting parties under the provisions of the General Agreement should promote the basic objectives of the Agreement, including those embodied in the Preamble and in Article XXXVI. Less-developed contracting parties expect that their capacity to make contributions or negotiated concessions or take other mutually agreed action under the provisions and procedures of the General Agreement would improve with the progressive development of their economies and improvement in their trade situation and they would accordingly expect to participate more fully in the framework of rights and obligations under the General Agreement. Particular account shall be taken of the serious difficulty of the least-developed countries in making concessions and contributions in view of their special economic situation and their development, financial and trade needs."¹⁴

I. TEXT OF ARTICLE XXXVII AND INTERPRETATIVE NOTE AD ARTICLE XXXVII

Article XXXVII

Commitments

1. The developed contracting parties shall to the fullest extent possible – that is, except when compelling reasons, which may include legal reasons, make it impossible – give effect to the following provisions:

- (a) accord high priority to the reduction and elimination of barriers to products currently or potentially of particular export interest to less-developed contracting parties, including customs duties and other restrictions which differentiate unreasonably between such products in their primary and in their processed forms;*
- (b) refrain from introducing, or increasing the incidence of, customs duties or non-tariff import barriers on products currently or potentially of particular export interest to less-developed contracting parties; and
- (c)
 - (i) refrain from imposing new fiscal measures, and
 - (ii) in any adjustments of fiscal policy accord high priority to the reduction and elimination of fiscal measures, which would hamper, or which hamper, significantly the growth of consumption of primary products, in raw or processed form, wholly or mainly produced in the territories of less-developed contracting parties, and which are applied specifically to those products.

2. (a) Whenever it is considered that effect is not being given to any of the provisions of sub-paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of paragraph 1, the matter shall be reported to the CONTRACTING PARTIES either by the contracting party not so giving effect to the relevant provisions or by any other interested contracting party.

(b) (i) The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall, if requested so to do by any interested contracting party, and without prejudice to any bilateral consultations that may be undertaken, consult with the contracting party concerned and all interested contracting parties with respect to the matter with a view to reaching solutions satisfactory to all contracting parties concerned in order to further the objectives set forth in Article XXXVI. In the course of these consultations, the reasons given in cases where effect was not being given to the provisions of sub-paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of paragraph 1 shall be examined.

(ii) As the implementation of the provisions of sub-paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of paragraph 1 by individual contracting parties may in some cases be more readily achieved where action is taken jointly with other developed contracting parties, such consultation might, where appropriate, be directed towards this end.

(iii) The consultations by the CONTRACTING PARTIES might also, in appropriate cases, be directed towards agreement on joint action designed to further the objectives of this Agreement as envisaged in paragraph 1 of Article XXV.

3. The developed contracting parties shall:

- (a) make every effort, in cases where a government directly or indirectly determines the resale price of products wholly or mainly produced in the territories of less-developed contracting parties, to maintain trade margins at equitable levels;
- (b) give active consideration to the adoption of other measures* designed to provide greater scope for the development of imports from less-developed contracting parties and collaborate in appropriate international action to this end;
- (c) have special regard to the trade interests of less-developed contracting parties when considering the application of other measures permitted under this Agreement to meet particular problems and explore all possibilities of constructive remedies before applying such measures where they would affect essential interests of those contracting parties.

4. Less-developed contracting parties agree to take appropriate action in implementation of the provisions of Part IV for the benefit of the trade of other less-developed contracting parties, in so far as such action is consistent with their individual present and future development, financial and trade needs taking into account past trade developments as well as the trade interests of less-developed contracting parties as a whole.

5. In the implementation of the commitments set forth in paragraph 1 to 4 each contracting party shall afford to any other interested contracting party or contracting parties full and prompt opportunity for consultations under the normal procedures of this Agreement with respect to any matter or difficulty which may arise.

Interpretative Note Ad Article XXXVII from Annex I

Paragraph 1 (a)

This paragraph would apply in the event of negotiations for reduction or elimination of tariffs or other restrictive regulations of commerce under Articles XXVIII, XXVIII bis (XXIX after the amendment set forth in Section A of paragraph 1 of the Protocol Amending Part I and Articles XXIX and XXX shall have become effective), and Article XXXIII, as well as in connection with other action to effect such reduction or elimination which contracting parties may be able to undertake.

Paragraph 3 (b)

The other measures referred to in this paragraph might include steps to promote domestic structural changes, to encourage the consumption of particular products, or to introduce measures of trade promotion.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXVII

A. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXVII

1. Paragraph 1

(1) “to the fullest extent possible”

In 1964 the Committee on the Legal and Institutional Framework of the GATT in Relation to Less-Developed Countries stated in its Report that it “recognized that the phrase ‘to the fullest extent possible’ would have the effect of leaving the applicability of the provisions of sub-paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of paragraph 1 exclusively to the judgement of each contracting party subject to them”. Some developing contracting parties expressed concern “that this phrase might be used in a way that would considerably detract from the effectiveness of the paragraph”. For this reason, the Committee “agreed to incorporate in the commitment an interpretation of the phrase ‘to the fullest extent possible’ and to make provision for consultations”.¹

A 1976 Secretariat Note on the application of Part IV states:

“... the draft model chapter on trade and development prepared initially by the secretariat on the basis of proposals from delegations for incorporation as Part IV of the General Agreement, did not contain any qualifying clause. The words, ‘to the fullest extent possible,’ appear to have been inserted in the draft later as most of the developed countries considered that they would not be in a position to accept commitments in this area unless there were provisions for exceptions in appropriate cases. The developing countries, on the other hand, were concerned that the phrase ‘to the fullest extent possible’ might be used by developed contracting parties ‘in a way that would considerably detract from the effectiveness of this paragraph’. As a compromise, it was agreed that the term ‘to the fullest extent possible’ should be explained further by stating that it means ‘except when compelling reasons, which may include legal reasons, make it impossible’. It was also agreed to provide in paragraph 2 of Article XXXVII for a procedure for consultations in cases of non-compliance so as to ensure as far as possible that the commitments were honoured and implemented by the contracting parties concerned. ...

“With respect to the language qualifying the commitments in Article XXXVII:1, it is not possible to say how it has weighed with governments in meeting their commitments including the undertaking to refrain from introducing new, or increasing the incidence of existing, barriers to the trade of developing countries (Article XXXVII:1(b)). However, in the course of the reviews undertaken by the Committee, representatives of developed contracting parties have been able to indicate the reasons underlying any specific measures which may have been introduced, including new barriers to trade or the intensification of existing restrictions.”²

The 1980 Panel Report on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Apples from Chile” concluded that the EEC import restrictions at issue were not in conformity with Article XIII. In response to a claim of Chile regarding the application of Part IV,

“The Panel examined the EEC measure in relation to the objectives and commitments embodied in Articles XXXVI and XXXVII; in particular XXXVII:1(b) ... Although the EEC measure did affect the ability of a developing country to export into the EEC market, the Panel noted that the EEC had taken certain actions, including bilateral consultations in order to avoid suspending imports of apples from Chile. After a careful examination, the Panel could not determine that the EEC had not made serious efforts to avoid taking protective measures against Chile. Therefore the Panel did not conclude that the EEC was in breach of its obligations under Part IV.”³

¹L/2281, para. 4.

²COM.TD/W/239, p. 5, paras. 9-10.

The 1989 Panel Report on “EEC - Restrictions on Imports of Dessert Apples - Complaint by Chile” examined the EEC’s system of restrictive licensing applied to imports of apples under various provisions of the General Agreement:

“The Panel examined the EEC measures in relation to the objectives and commitments embodied in Articles XXXVI and XXXVII of Part IV of the General Agreement, particularly XXXVII:1(b) which states that ‘the developed contracting parties shall to the fullest extent possible ... refrain from introducing, or increasing the incidence of, customs duties or non-tariff import barriers on products currently or potentially of particular export interest to less developed contracting parties’; and XXXVII:3(c), which requires developed contracting parties to ‘have special regard to the trade interests of less-developed contracting parties when considering the application of other measures permitted under this Agreement to meet particular problems and explore all possibilities of constructive remedies before applying such measures where they would affect essential interests of those contracting parties’.

“The Panel found that the EEC’s import measures on dessert apples did affect a product of particular export interest to less-developed contracting parties. It noted that the EEC had held consultations with affected suppliers and had amended its regulations, but these consultations and amendments had been general in scope and had not related specifically to the interests of less-developed contracting parties in terms of Part IV. Following a careful examination of this issue, the Panel could not find that the EEC had made appropriate efforts to avoid taking protective measures on apples originating in Chile. However, the Panel noted that the commitments entered into by contracting parties under Article XXXVII were additional to their obligations under Parts I - III of the General Agreement, and that these commitments thus applied to measures which were permitted under Parts I - III. As the Panel had found the EEC’s import restrictions to be inconsistent with specific obligations of the EEC under Part II of the General Agreement, it therefore did not consider it necessary to pursue the matter further under Article XXXVII.”⁴

(2) “accord high priority”

See the Interpretative Note to paragraph 1(a).

The 1976 Secretariat Note on the application of Part IV states:

“In so far as according ‘high priority’ to the removal of trade barriers on products of export interest to developing countries is concerned, it has been suggested that any such action needed to be considered in the context of the existing legal or other authority available to the contracting party concerned for initiating such action and the extent to which such action may have to be considered in the light of measures affecting trade relations with other developed contracting parties.”⁵

(3) “refrain from introducing”; “refrain from imposing”; “products ... of particular export interest to less-developed contracting parties”

(a) Trade measures taken for balance-of-payments purposes

The Report of the 1971 Working Party on “United States Temporary Import Surcharge” includes the following paragraphs:

“A number of representatives of developing countries said that they could not accept the United States contention that exemption from the surcharge for exports of developing countries could be construed as discrimination, impermissible under the General Agreement. Article XXXVII clearly established that, in the absence of compelling reasons, developed contracting parties must abstain from introducing or increasing tariff or non-tariff barriers vis-à-vis developing countries. They did not consider that the United States had advanced compelling reasons since there could be no serious economic effects for the United States in exempting developing countries from the surcharge. They, therefore, drew the conclusion that Article XXXVII was not being respected and stressed the fundamental importance to developing countries of this Article - the sole commitment of developed countries towards developing countries. In the view of some of these delegations, this Article should be considered as being parallel in application to other Articles in the GATT. Moreover, they considered that the surcharge was inconsistent with current trends in international co-operation, as exemplified by the Generalized System of Preferences and with recent developments in other international organizations.

“The representative of the United States drew attention to the fact that Article XXXVII provided for a standstill only as regards ‘products’ of export interest to developing countries and stated that the United States had endeavoured to exempt such products from the surcharge by the exclusion of duty-free items. He further stated that it was neither possible nor proper to identify those countries that were ‘responsible’ for the balance-of-payments difficulties and to exclude all others from the operation of the surcharge.”⁶

The 1976 Secretariat Note on the application of Part IV states:

“During the review of the application of Part IV in the Committee on Trade and Development in 1968/69, some developing countries have mentioned that import surcharges and import deposit schemes when introduced or maintained by developed countries should not be applied to imports from developing countries in the light of the provisions of Part IV. Developed countries which had resorted to such measures for balance-of-payments reasons stated that they had endeavoured to abide by the obligations assumed by them under Part IV and had given special consideration to the interests of developing countries. For example, some developed countries had exempted from import deposit or surcharge schemes, raw materials and certain semi-finished products which constituted a substantial share in the exports of developing countries to their markets. It was, however, not possible for them to consider complete exemption from such schemes of imports from developing countries as this would weaken the effectiveness of the measures taken and might thus necessitate emergency measures being continued for a longer period ... It may be mentioned that one country exempted from its import surcharge imports entering under its Generalized System of Preferences.”⁷

The 1979 “Declaration on Trade Measures taken for Balance-of-Payments Purposes” provides, inter alia:

“If, notwithstanding the principles of this Declaration, a developed contracting party is compelled to apply restrictive import measures for balance-of-payments purposes, it shall, in determining the incidence of its measures, take into account the export interests of the less-developed contracting parties and may exempt from its measures products of export interest to those contracting parties.”⁸

(b) Safeguard measures under Article XIX

The drafting history of Part IV of the General Agreement indicates that an escape clause action would fall within paragraph 1(b) of Article XXXVII.⁹

The 1976 Secretariat Note on the application of Part IV states:

“At the eighteenth session of the Committee on Trade and Development in July 1971, a proposal for differential treatment in favour of developing countries was made in relation to Article XIX, having regard to Part IV and in particular Article XXXVII (COM.TD/82). Further discussion on this issue has taken place at subsequent meetings of the Committee on Trade and Development (COM.TD/84, L/3760, 3873) and in the MTN Group ‘Safeguards’. Developing countries have suggested that the general rule should be that safeguard measures should not be applied by developed countries to imports from developing countries. Exceptions should be made to this rule only in specific and clearly delineated circumstances, subject to objective criteria and appropriate justification procedures, and only after prior consultations had taken place with the affected developing countries and after the safeguard measures had been authorized by an appropriate multilateral body. They have also expressed the view that safeguard action should only be taken in cases of proven actual material injury and not in cases of potential injury. Such action should take into account, inter alia, actual material injury to the export industries of developing countries. More emphasis should be put on adjustment assistance measures in developed countries to make sure as far as possible that future safeguard actions were not necessary.

“Developing countries have also called for special provisions to be elaborated in order to facilitate the application by developing countries of safeguard measures, in accordance with their particular needs and interests.

“It might be noted that in discussions in the Committee on Trade and Development, developed countries, although agreeing that careful consideration should be given to the interests of developing countries when safeguard action was contemplated, generally considered that it would be inappropriate to revise Article XIX along the lines proposed by developing countries. They maintained that such differential treatment, by reducing the ‘safety-valve’ value of Article XIX, would make contracting parties reluctant to make tariff concessions which they would be otherwise prepared to make and might encourage the taking of action by importing countries inconsistent with the GATT. Some developed countries stated that they could not accept that Part IV allowed a departure from the principle of non-discrimination with regard to Article XIX, which ought to be applied across the board on a most-favoured-nation basis.”¹⁰

A 1978 Secretariat Note on “Modalities of Application of Article XIX”¹¹ stated that as of that time there had been no instances where Article XXXVII had been relied upon to exempt developing countries from actions taken under Article XIX.

(c) Fiscal measures

The Conclusions and Resolutions adopted by Ministers on 21 May 1963, include, inter alia:

“Industrialized countries shall progressively reduce internal charges and revenue duties on products wholly or mainly produced in less-developed countries with a view to their elimination by 31 December 1965.”¹²

¹¹L/4679, para. 29.

¹²12S/36, 37, para. (vi).

The 1970 Report of the Working Party on “Border Tax Adjustments” notes that “Members from developing countries drew attention to the Ministerial Conclusions of 1963 and Article XXXVII of the GATT, which stressed that developed contracting parties should endeavour to suppress taxes on products imported essentially from developing countries ... Representatives of developed countries considered that a distinction should be made between internal charges of a general application and selective or specific taxes, since many of the taxes imposed such as cumulative turnover taxes and the tax on value added affected all products and were, in their view, not covered by Article XXXVII:1(c), which refers to fiscal measures applied specifically to those products in raw or processed form wholly or mainly produced in the territories of developing contracting parties. Representatives of developing countries pointed out that in the process of change-over to [value-added taxes], selective excise taxes were replaced by general consumption taxes. They therefore considered that the provisions of Article XXXVII:1(c) were applicable.”¹³

2. Paragraph 2: “The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall ... consult with the contracting party concerned”

In 1965-66, an Ad Hoc Group on Legal Amendments established by the Committee on Trade and Development drew up “Procedures under Article XXIII” for complaints by developing contracting parties. Paragraph 11 of these Procedures provides that “If consultations, held under paragraph 2 of Article XXXVII, relate to restrictions for which there is no authority under any provisions to the General Agreement, any of the parties to the consultations may, in the absence of a satisfactory solution, request that consultations be carried out by the CONTRACTING PARTIES pursuant to paragraph 2 of Article XXIII and in accordance with the procedures set out in the present decision, it being understood that a consultation held under paragraph 2 of Article XXXVII in respect of such restrictions will be considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as fulfilling the conditions of paragraph 1 of Article XXIII if the parties to the consultations so agree.”¹⁴

In March 1970, the Committee on Trade and Development adopted Procedures for “Consultations Concerning the Implementation of Provisions of Part IV”.¹⁵ The terms of reference of the Committee on Trade and Development also provide for a review at each of its meetings of the implementation of the provisions of Part IV. The Committee has agreed to undertake, at least once a year, a full review of developments on the basis of notifications submitted by governments. Concerning the mandate and work of the Committee, see further the chapter on Part IV.

No consultations have ever been held under Article XXXVII:2 and paragraph 11 of the 1966 Procedures has never been invoked.

3. Paragraph 3

(1) “give active consideration to the adoption of other measures”

See the Interpretative Note to paragraph 3(b).

(2) “have special regard to the trade interests of less-developed contracting parties when considering the application of other measures”

According to the 1976 Secretariat Note on the application of Part IV, the drafting history of Part IV shows that “escape clause action and countervailing and anti-dumping duties” were among the “other measures” intended as being subject to the provisions of Article XXXVII:3(c). During the discussions relating to the drafting of Part IV, one developing country had suggested that paragraph 3(c) of Article XXXVII should be strengthened by providing that developed contracting parties should “refrain from applying” measures such as countervailing and anti-dumping duties if they affected the essential interests of developing countries. From the records of discussions it would appear that this and other similar proposals to make the provisions of paragraph 3(c) of Article XXXVII more specific were not acceptable to developed countries which considered that the indiscriminate use of subsidies for the promotion of exports of manufactured products would not be in the interests of developing countries themselves.¹⁶

The Report of the Working Party on a 1967 consultation under Article XXII:2 on the "United States Subsidy on Unmanufactured Tobacco" notes that during the consultation, Malawi, supported by other members of the Working Party, stated that while prior consultations were not explicitly required under Article XXXVII:3(c), such consultations "would enable a less-developed country concerned to express its views which might not otherwise be known to the industrialized country contemplating action".¹⁷ The United States stated in reply that Article XXXVII:3(c) "did not obligate a contracting party to hold consultations prior to the introduction of the subsidy".¹⁸ The Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES later noted "that the report of the Working Party contained no conclusive indication as regards damage to the trade interests of other tobacco producers arising from the existence of the United States subsidy. However, as it appeared that, to some extent, the provisions of Part IV were involved and as it was conceivable that the trade interests of other producers could be affected," he suggested, and it was so agreed, that CONTRACTING PARTIES urge the United States to give sympathetic and urgent consideration to the requests made by certain members of the Working Party.¹⁹ These members had requested that the US remove the subsidy and consult before taking action to extend the existing subsidy.²⁰

During the Council discussions in October 1974 of United States countervailing duties on imports of non-rubber footwear from Brazil, the representative of Brazil stated that countervailing duties were among the "other measures" referred to in Article XXXVII:3(c). The representative of the United States said that the countervailing measures had met the requirements of Part IV.²¹

Article 13 of the 1979 Agreement on Implementation of Article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which was agreed in the Tokyo Round, provides that:

"It is recognized that special regard must be given by developed countries to the special situation of developing countries when considering the application of anti-dumping measures under this Code. Possibilities of constructive remedies provided for by this Code shall be explored before applying anti-dumping duties where they would affect the essential interests of developing countries."²²

The Decision of 5 May 1980 of the Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices provides that:

"The Committee, cognizant of the commitment in Article 13 of the Agreement on Implementation of Article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade that special regard must be given by developed countries to the special situation of developing countries when considering the application of anti-dumping measures under the Agreement, takes the following decision concerning the application and interpretation of the Agreement in relation to developing countries:

"(i) In developing countries, governments play a large rôle in promoting economic growth and development in accordance with their national priorities, and their economic régimes for the export sector can be different from those relating to their domestic sectors resulting inter alia in different cost structures. This Agreement is not intended to prevent developing countries from adopting measures in this context, including measures in the export sector, as long as they are used in a manner which is consistent with the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, as applicable to these countries.

“(ii) In the case of imports from a developing country, the fact that the export price may be lower than the comparable price for the like product when destined for domestic consumption in the exporting country does not per se justify an investigation or the determination of dumping unless the other factors mentioned in Article 5:1 are also present. Due consideration should be given to all cases where, because special economic conditions affect prices in the home market, these prices do not provide a commercially realistic basis for dumping calculations. In such cases the normal value for the purposes of ascertaining whether the goods are being dumped shall be determined by methods such as a comparison of the export price with the comparable price of the like product when exported to any third country or with the cost of production of the exported goods in the country of origin plus a reasonable amount for administrative, selling and any other costs and for profits ...”²³

4. Relationship between Article XXXVII and other Articles

(1) Articles I and XIII

The 1976 Secretariat Note on the application of Part IV states:

“With respect to the standstill, one view which has been expressed in the Committee by representatives of some developed countries has been the need to take measures which do not distinguish between different sources of supply. While developing countries have sought the exemption of their exports from the scope of any new measures raising trade barriers in developed country markets, developed countries have generally stated that such a distinction was not appropriate because of the legal provisions of GATT (e.g. Articles I and XIII) or because any such exemption would weaken the effect of the measures in question and mean their maintenance for a longer period of time than would otherwise be necessary. On the other hand, it has been stated that while developing country exports could not be exempted as a general rule from across-the-board actions, careful consideration had been given to the exclusion from such actions of products or product areas of interest to developing countries, taking into account the need not to impair the essential purpose or objectives which the measures have been intended to serve.”²⁴

The same Secretariat Note also states:

“At the time of the drafting of Part IV, preference schemes in favour of developing countries and between developing countries were under discussion. In this respect, consideration was given to whether provision should be made for these matters on a legal and formal basis. In the Committee on the Legal and Institutional Framework of GATT in Relation to Less-Developed Countries, it was suggested in 1963 that in Article I of the General Agreement, the most-favoured-nation provision should be amended to provide for new preferential agreements in favour of less-developed countries (Spec(63)276). Subsequently, the ‘Model Chapter’ which was drawn up by the secretariat on the basis of proposals made by contracting parties included the following sub-paragraph in the section dealing with joint action in relation to economic development:

‘(b) that nothing in the General Agreement shall prevent effect being given to arrangements agreed upon in the furtherance of the commitments outlined in [Article XXXVII:1-5].’

“This was accompanied by the comment that the sub-paragraph would provide a legal basis for giving effect to preferences accorded by developed countries to imports from developing countries and to preferences accorded by developing countries to each other even if they deviated from other provisions of the General Agreement. It would appear that it was found impossible to agree on any such enabling clause and, rather than delay the implementation of Part IV, it was decided that, while excluding such a reference from the final provisions, work should continue on the question of preferences.

“Some developing countries suggested, at the time of the discussion in GATT on the provision of a legal basis for the Generalized System of Preferences, that Article XXXVII:3(b) provided such a basis for preferences in favour of developing countries. ... Developed countries could not agree that this provision provided authority for action which in their view was inconsistent with objectives under other provisions of the General Agreement and it was eventually decided that a legal basis for the Generalized System of Preferences should be provided by means of a waiver from the provisions of Article I. ... A similar waiver was provided to cover preferences between developing countries under 'The Protocol Relating to Trade Negotiations Among Developing Countries', although some countries considered that Article XXXVII:4 provided an adequate legal basis."²⁵

²⁴COM.TD/W/239, p. 5, para. 11.

A separate legal basis was later established for preferences for and between developing countries by the 1979 Decision on Differential and More Favourable Treatment, Reciprocity and Fuller Participation of Developing Countries (Enabling Clause) of 28 November 1979.²⁶ See further concerning this Decision under Article I.

B. EXCEPTIONS AND DEROGATIONS

On 19 May 1965, Australia accepted the Protocol Introducing Part IV with a Declaration stating the understanding that

"(a) because of its own development needs and policies it would be inappropriate for Australia, one of the contracting parties referred to in Article XVIII:4(b) of the General Agreement, the economy of which is in the course of industrial development and which is seeking to avoid an excessive dependence on a limited range of primary products for its export earnings but which is not a less-developed country, to undertake to give effect to the provisions of paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of Article XXXVII to the same extent or in the same manner as the other contracting parties to which those paragraphs apply; and

"(b) the provisions of those paragraphs of Article XXXVII will be applied to the fullest extent consistent with Australia's development needs and policies and responsibilities".²⁷

Joint Action

1. The contracting parties shall collaborate jointly, within the framework of this Agreement and elsewhere, as appropriate, to further the objectives set forth in Article XXXVI.
 2. In particular, the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall:
 - (a) where appropriate, take action, including action through international arrangements, to provide improved and acceptable conditions of access to world markets for primary products of particular interest to less-developed contracting parties and to devise measures designed to stabilize and improve conditions of world markets in these products including measures designed to attain stable, equitable and remunerative prices for exports of such products;
 - (b) seek appropriate collaboration in matters of trade and development policy with the United Nations and its organs and agencies, including any institutions that may be created on the basis of recommendations by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development;
 - (c) collaborate in analysing the development plans and policies of individual less-developed contracting parties and in examining trade and aid relationships with a view to devising concrete measures to promote the development of export potential and to facilitate access to export markets for the products of the industries thus developed and, in this connexion, seek appropriate collaboration with governments and international organizations, and in particular with organizations having competence in relation to financial assistance for economic development, in systematic studies of trade and aid relationships in individual less-developed contracting parties aimed at obtaining a clear analysis of export potential, market prospects and any further action that may be required;
 - (d) keep under continuous review the development of world trade with special reference to the rate of growth of the trade of less-developed contracting parties and make such recommendations to contracting parties as may, in the circumstances, be deemed appropriate;
 - (e) collaborate in seeking feasible methods to expand trade for the purpose of economic development, through international harmonization and adjustment of national policies and regulations, through technical and commercial standards affecting production, transportation and marketing, and through export promotion by the establishment of facilities for the increased flow of trade information and the development of market research; and
 - (f) establish such institutional arrangements as may be necessary to further the objectives set forth in Article XXXVI and to give effect to the provision of this Part.

II. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE XXXVIII

1. Paragraph 1: “The contracting parties shall collaborate ... to further the objectives”

The Report of the Panel on “European Communities - Refunds on Exports of Sugar - Complaint by Brazil”, notes that the Brazilian representative argued that by maintaining its sugar subsidy system, resulting in increased exports and reduced imports, and by refusing to participate in the International Sugar Agreement, 1977 (“ISA”), the European Communities had acted inconsistently with Article XXXVIII:1, 2, 2(a) and 2(e).¹ The Panel findings provide as follows:

“The Panel noted the principles and objectives stipulated in Article XXXVI and the guidelines for joint action given in Article XXXVIII to further the objectives set forth in Article XXXVI, and that Brazil being a developing country could expect to enjoy benefits in accordance with these provisions. In this connection, the Panel also noted that the European Communities had made considerable efforts in favour of a number of developing countries and had pursued an active and constructive policy towards the setting-up of international agreements.

“However, the Panel also noted that in the particular situation in the sugar market in 1978 and 1979, when Brazil and other developing countries took action through the ISA to improve the market situation, the European Communities increased its subsidized sugar exports to an extent that inevitably reduced significantly the effects of the measures taken by Brazil and other sugar exporters. It was evident that the magnitude of subsidized Community sugar exports together with the extensive use of maximum export refunds, tended to accentuate the detrimental effect on export earnings of other sugar exporters directly faced with the competition from Community sugar. The Panel felt that even though the European Communities was not a party to the ISA and not bound by the same obligations as members to that Agreement, it would nevertheless be appropriate to collaborate with other contracting parties in conformity with the guidelines given in Article XXXVIII and thus further the principles and objectives of Article XXXVI.”²

The Panel concluded:

“The Panel recognized the efforts made by the European Communities in complying with the provisions of Articles XXXVI and XXXVIII. It nevertheless felt that increased Community exports of sugar through the use of subsidies in the particular market situation in 1978 and 1979, and where developing contracting parties had taken steps within the framework of the ISA to improve the conditions in the world sugar market, inevitably reduced the effects of the efforts made by these countries. For this time-period and for this particular field, the European Communities had therefore not collaborated jointly with other contracting parties to further the principles and objectives set forth in Article XXXVI, in conformity with the guidelines given in Article XXXVIII.”³

2. Paragraph 2(f): “The CONTRACTING PARTIES shall ... establish ... such institutional arrangements as may be necessary”

The CONTRACTING PARTIES established the Committee on Trade and Development on 26 November 1964 to “keep under continuous review the application of the provisions of Part IV” and to carry out various other tasks related to the implementation of Part IV.⁴ See the chapter on Part IV concerning the mandate and activities of the Committee and its Sub-Committees.

I. TEXT OF THE PROTOCOL OF PROVISIONAL APPLICATION

1. The Governments of the COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA, the KINGDOM OF BELGIUM (in respect of its metropolitan territory), CANADA, the FRENCH REPUBLIC (in respect of its metropolitan territory), the GRAND-DUCHY OF LUXEMBURG, the KINGDOM OF THE NETHERLANDS (in respect of its metropolitan territory), the UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND (in respect of its metropolitan territory), and the UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, undertake, provided that this Protocol shall have been signed on behalf of all the foregoing Governments not later than 15 November 1947, to apply provisionally on and after 1 January 1948:

- (a) Parts I and III of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and
- (b) Part II of that Agreement to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation.

2. The foregoing Governments shall make effective such provisional application of the General Agreement, in respect of any of their territories other than their metropolitan territories, on or after 1 January 1948, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day on which notice of such application is received by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

3. Any other government signatory to this Protocol shall make effective such provisional application of the General Agreement, on or after 1 January 1948, upon the expiration of thirty days from the day of signature of this Protocol on behalf of such Government.

4. This Protocol shall remain open for signature at the Headquarters of the United Nations (a) until 15 November 1947, on behalf of any government named in paragraph 1 of this Protocol which has not signed it on this day, and (b) until 30 June 1948, on behalf of any other Government signatory to the Final Act adopted at the conclusion of the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment which has not signed it on this day.

5. Any government applying this Protocol shall be free to withdraw such application, and such withdrawal shall take effect upon the expiration of sixty days from the day on which written notice of such withdrawal is received by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

6. The original of this Protocol shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who will furnish certified copies thereof to all interested Governments.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the respective Representatives, after having communicated their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have signed the Protocol.

DONE at Geneva, in a single copy, in the English and French languages, both texts authentic, this thirtieth day of October one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven.

II. NOTES ON PROVISIONAL APPLICATION

A. GENERAL

Pending its entry into force under the provisions of Article XXVI:6, the General Agreement ("GATT 1947") has been applied provisionally. Contracting parties listed in the Preamble apply the General Agreement under the provisions of the Protocol of Provisional Application (PPA). Contracting parties which have acceded since 1948 apply the Agreement under the provisions of their protocols of accession. A government becoming a contracting party under Article XXVI:5(c) does so on the terms and conditions previously accepted by the metropolitan government on behalf of the territory in question, including those in the PPA or accession protocols.¹ For these reasons, not only the governments signatory to the PPA, but also the governments that became contracting parties through accession under Article XXXIII or succession under Article XXVI:5(c), have the right to apply the General Agreement only to the fullest extent not inconsistent with their existing legislation, and to cease to apply the General Agreement on sixty days' notice.

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have on a number of occasions considered the question of whether provisional application under the PPA and protocols of accession should be replaced by definitive application under Article XXVI.²

The WTO Agreement provides in its Article II:2 that the agreements and associated legal instruments included in Annexes 1A, 2 and 3 are integral parts of that Agreement and binding on all Members. A Member that has accepted or acceded to the WTO Agreement is thus bound definitively by "GATT 1994", as defined in Annex 1A of the WTO Agreement. On 8 December 1994, at their Sixth Special Session, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Decision on "Transitional Co-existence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement", which provides inter alia:

"The legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are herewith terminated one year after the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement. In the light of unforeseen circumstances, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may decide to postpone the date of termination by no more than one year."³

A. INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF PROVISIONS ON PROVISIONAL APPLICATION

1. Paragraph 1 of the Protocol of Provisional Application and corresponding provisions in accession protocols

(1) "Part II of that Agreement"

(a) Part II of the original General Agreement

The "grandfather clause" for existing legislation was intended to apply provisionally pending the entry into force of the Havana Charter. Article XXIX:2 of the General Agreement text as of 30 October 1947 provided that

“On the day on which the Charter of the International Trade Organization enters into force, Article I and Part II of this Agreement shall be suspended and superseded by the corresponding provisions of the Charter”.

During the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee, the Tariff Negotiations Working Party requested delegations to inform it of the steps which would be necessary to put the General Agreement into force.⁴ A number of delegations stated that definitive entry into force might take substantial time.⁵ To avoid undue delay in application of the tariff concessions, and provide “early proof ... to the world of the benefits accruing from the present negotiations”, the full draft of the General Agreement produced by the Tariff Negotiations Working Party included an Article XXXII on provisional application.⁶ The working party stated in this respect:

“It will be noted that application of Part II is to take place ‘to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation’. The position of governments unable to put Part II of the Agreement fully into force on a provisional basis without changes in existing legislation is, therefore, covered.”⁷

The Panel on “Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Apples and Pears” examined whether Norway’s system of restrictive licensing for apples and pears was consistent with the existing legislation clause.

“The Panel began its examination by analysing the historical origin of the Protocol and relevant decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES relating to the existing legislation clause.

“The Panel noted in the first place that paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol served a well determined purpose in a particular historical situation. It was to enable, in 1947, governments to accept the obligations of Part II of the General Agreement without having to adjust their domestic legislation. The drafters of the Protocol expected the General Agreement to be superseded soon by the ITO Charter and they felt that legislative changes should not be required at that time because such changes would have delayed the acceptance of the obligations under the General Agreement and could have prejudged the outcome of the negotiations on the Charter. ... In the light of this purpose of the existing legislation clause, the Panel considered that it would not be justified to give this clause four decades after the entry into force of the Protocol an interpretation that would extend its functions beyond those it was originally designed to serve.”⁸

The Note Ad Article I:1 provides that “The obligations incorporated in paragraph 1 of Article I by reference to paragraphs 2 and 4 of Article III and those incorporated in paragraph 2(b) of Article II by reference to Article VI shall be considered as falling within Part II for the purposes of the Protocol of Provisional Application.” This provision was intended to reserve legislation regarding preferential internal taxes until definitive application of the General Agreement.⁹ Protocols of accession contain a similar standard provision; see under Article XXXIII.

(b) Subsequent amendments to Part II

In the “Resolution of 7 March 1955 Expressing the Unanimous Agreement of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the Attaching of a Reservation on Acceptance pursuant to Article XXVI”, the contracting parties unanimously agreed, inter alia,

“that an acceptance pursuant to Article XXVI shall be valid even if accompanied by a reservation to the effect that Part II of the General Agreement will be applied to the fullest extent not inconsistent with legislation which existed on 30 October 1947 or, in the case of a contracting party which since 30 June 1949 has acceded to the Agreement, the date of the Protocol providing for such accession”.¹⁰

In a Declaration of 15 November 1957 on “Statements which Accompanied the Acceptance of the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III”, the CONTRACTING PARTIES declared

“that the statements which accompanied the signatures or acceptances by certain contracting parties of the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade are accepted on the understanding that they confirm the legal situation existing under the instrument by which each of these governments became a contracting party. Consequently, each of those contracting parties continues to apply Part II of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (as revised) to the fullest extent not inconsistent with legislation which existed on the date mentioned in the instrument by which it became a contracting party; following acceptance pursuant to Article XXVI, any contracting party will have the right to apply Part II, subject to any reservation accompanying such acceptance in the terms provided for in the Resolution approved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 7 March 1955”.¹¹

Consequently, Part II of the General Agreement, as revised by the Protocol Amending the Preamble and Parts II and III, applies to the fullest extent not inconsistent with “existing legislation” on the relevant date.

The three Panel reports on income tax practices maintained by Belgium, France and the Netherlands note the argument by the United States that the language of the Review Session amendments to the General Agreement introducing Article XVI:4, the 1960 Declaration giving effect to Article XVI:4, and the Standstill Declaration, meant that the contracting parties adhering to the 1960 Declaration had an obligation to cease granting any subsidies whether or not the subsidies were granted pursuant to legislation existing in 1947, unless a specific reservation was made. The Panel reports state in this respect:

“The Panel considered that the fact that these arrangements might have existed before the General Agreement was not a justification for them and noted that Belgium [France, Netherlands] had made no reservation with respect to the standstill agreement or to the 1960 Declaration”.¹²

(1) “not inconsistent with existing legislation”

(a) Date of reference for the phrase “existing legislation”

On the question whether the phrase “existing legislation” in paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol of Provisional Application refers to legislation existing on the date of the Protocol or on that of signature of the Protocol by the government concerned, the Chairman ruled on 11 August 1949 that it refers to legislation existing on 30 October 1947, the date of the Protocol as written at the end of its last paragraph.¹³ It was stated, however, that “particular attention should be given to the special and exceptional circumstances of Pakistan, i.e. those attendant upon the coming into existence of the new state”.¹⁴

The 1984 Panel Report on “United States Manufacturing Clause” “noted that, according to paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol, Part II of the General Agreement is to be applied ‘to the fullest extent not inconsistent with existing legislation’, that is, mandatory legislation in force on 30 October 1947”.¹⁵

For contracting parties applying the General Agreement under the provisions of a protocol of accession, the relevant date is that specified in the protocol of accession. The standard text of protocols of accession provides that the government in question will apply “Part II of the General Agreement to the fullest extent not inconsistent with the relevant legislation of [the acceding government] existing on the date of this Protocol”.¹⁶ The report of

The Pakistan Parliament did not meet until 1948 at which time it proceeded to enact legislation to replace the legislation previously applicable to the whole continent of India. This in some cases differed from the previous existing legislation. [The Chairman] felt that if any case ever arose out of these circumstances, the contracting parties should give special attention and sympathetic consideration to such a case.” GATT/CP.3/SR.40 p. 5.

¹⁶The two exceptions are in the accession protocols of Switzerland and Israel, in which cases the reference dates are the dates of the the 1949 Working Party on "Accession at Annecy" which first considered the subject of accession to the General Agreement notes that "It was considered that, although there were arguments for applying the same limitation to the exception for existing legislation - namely, that existing at the date of the Protocol of Provisional Application - this might in fact be a considerable obstacle to accession. It might require an acceding government to amend legislation enacted prior to the formal completion of the negotiations, which had not been the case for the present contracting parties at Geneva".¹⁷

(b) Mandatory character of "existing legislation"

During the discussions in the Tariff Agreement Committee at Geneva, it was stated that:

"... the intent is that it should be what the executive authority can do -- in other words, the Administration would be required to give effect to the general provisions to the extent that it could do so without either (1) changing the existing legislation or (2) violating existing legislation. If a particular administrative regulation is necessary to carry out the law... that regulation would, of course, have to stand; but to the extent that the Administration had authority within the framework of existing laws to carry out these provisions, it would be required to do so".¹⁸

In 1949 at the Third Session, a working party considered notifications of pre-existing measures under paragraphs 6 or 11 of Article XVIII, which at that time permitted maintenance of certain measures if they had been notified and had received the concurrence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. It was argued that this notification process was unnecessary in the case of measures permitted by the Protocol of Provisional Application. The 1949 Working Party report on "Notifications of Existing Measures and Procedural Questions" states:

"The Working Party directed its attention to the question of whether a government is obliged to notify [under Article XVIII:6 or XVIII:11] if the measure in question is permitted during the period of provisional application by virtue of sub-paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol of Provisional Application or sub-paragraph 1(a)(ii) of the Annecy Protocol of Terms of Accession. The working party agreed that a measure is so permitted, provided that the legislation on which it is based is by its terms or expressed intent of a mandatory character -- that is, it imposes on the executive authority requirements which cannot be modified by executive action."¹⁹

In the discussion when this report was adopted, the United States representative suggested the addition of the words "without departing from the intent of a measure embodied in the legislation" to the last sentence cited, so as to cover the case of legislation which was mandatory in intent but couched in permissive terms. The representative of Brazil "inquired whether [this] proposed ... wording would cover the case of specific measures taken by the executive power in pursuance of a general authorization of the legislature". The Chairman felt that this interpretation would be contrary to the conclusion reached by the Working Party as the sentence states: 'imposes on the executive authority requirements which cannot be modified by executive action'. It was agreed that the United States position would be met by the insertion of the wording "by its terms or expressed intent". In response to a further inquiry, the Chairman stated that "The proposed amendment by the United States only broadened the concept of mandatory legislation to include legislation which was mandatory by its expressed intent. Any further interpretation would depend on the particular cases".²⁰

The 1949 Working Party Report on "Brazilian Internal Taxes" examined Brazilian law 7404 of 1945, which imposed taxes which discriminated between products of national origin and like products supplied by other contracting parties, in the light of Article III and the Protocol of Provisional Application. The report notes that the "Brazilian delegate informed the working party that any change in the rates of tax established by this law could not have been effected by administrative action, but would have required amending legislation to be enacted by the Brazilian Congress. The working party therefore concluded that in view of the mandatory nature of law 7404 the taxes imposed by it, although discriminatory and hence contrary to the provisions of Article III, were preceding declarations providing for provisional accession.

permitted by the terms of the Protocol of Provisional Application and need not be altered so long as the General Agreement was being applied only provisionally by the Government of Brazil".²¹

The 1950 "Report on the Use of Quantitative Restrictions for Protective and Other Commercial Purposes" notes that "during the period of provisional application of the Agreement contracting parties may be entitled under paragraph 1 of the Protocol of Provisional Application ... to maintain certain export restrictions required by existing legislation which are not consistent with Part II of the Agreement".²²

In the 1952 Panel report on "Belgian Family Allowances"

"The Panel noted ... that, in another case, the CONTRACTING PARTIES agreed that the Protocol of Provisional Application had to be construed so as to limit the operation of the provisions of paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol to those cases where 'the legislation on which [the measure] is based is, by its tenor or expressed intent, of a mandatory character - that is, it imposes on the executive authorities requirements which cannot be modified by executive action' (Volume II, page 62). The Panel, although recognizing that the relevant provisions of the Belgian royal decree appeared to be of a mandatory character, noted that, as pointed out by the Danish and the Norwegian representatives and admitted by the Belgian representative, it had been possible for the Belgian executive authorities to grant an exemption to a country whose system of family allowances did not meet fully the requirements of the law. Even if it might be difficult for the Belgian authorities to take similar action in similar cases, the Panel did not feel that it had been proved to its satisfaction that the Belgian legislation fulfilled all the conditions laid down by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to justify an exception under the Protocol of Provisional Application".²³

In the report of the Review Session Working Party on "Organizational and Functional Questions", the Working Party noted:

"it is plain from the wording of the Protocol of Provisional Application that the exception can only be applicable to legislation which is, by its terms or expressed intent of a mandatory character, that is, it imposes on the executive authority requirements which cannot be modified by executive action. The representatives of Cuba and Chile reserved their positions on this interpretation of the Protocol of Provisional Application".²⁴

In 1957, the Working Party on "Import Restrictions of the Federal Republic of Germany" examined certain residual restrictions maintained after disinvocation of Article XII.

"a number of delegations ... were unable to accept the claim that the German Marketing Laws were covered by the qualifying clause in the Torquay Protocol relating to existing legislation. These Laws seemed to them to require that the goods in question (cereals, meat, fat and sugar) be imported under State monopoly, not that imports be restricted. Under paragraph 1(a)(ii) of the Torquay Protocol contracting parties are required to apply Part II of the General Agreement, including Article XI, 'to the fullest extent not inconsistent with the legislation existing' on 21 April 1951. In their view, this provision applied only in respect of legislation which was of a mandatory character, i.e. which imposed on the executive authority requirements which could not be modified by executive action. This meant that if 'existing legislation' left the German Government no discretion but to act contrary to Article XI the German Government would be entitled to suspend the application of the provisions of that Article to the extent necessary to conform to that legislation. On the other hand, where 'existing legislation' gave the Federal Government discretion between action which was in conflict with that Article and action which was consistent with it, then action in accordance with Article XI would not be inconsistent with its national legislation; there would thus be no ground for deviating from Article XI".²⁵ ²⁵L/768, adopted on 30 November 1957, 6S/55, 60, para. 12.

The same report also notes the same delegations' observation that "Should the view be accepted that all action under existing legislation was ipso facto exempt from the rules of Part II of the Agreement, most contracting parties would be entitled to claim the right to apply or maintain quantitative restrictions irrespective of their balance-of-payments position, and to take many other measures contrary to the provisions of the GATT; this would mean that Part II of the Agreement would have no binding force, and inter alia, the tariff concessions could therefore be completely nullified with impunity, a situation which would lead to a complete breakdown of the General Agreement".²⁶ Some other delegations disagreed with this interpretation. Similar differences of view are recorded in the second Working Party report, adopted on 2 May 1958, on "Import Restrictions Maintained by the Federal Republic of Germany".²⁷ The waiver granted on 30 May 1959 to the Federal Republic of Germany for maintenance of certain import restrictions contains the following considerandum:

"The Federal Republic contends that it is entitled to maintain restrictions on imports of products specified in the Agricultural Marketing Laws because (a) the German Marketing Laws impose on the German executive mandatory requirements for the application of restrictions on imports and (b) in any case this legislation does not need to impose a mandatory requirement in order to be covered by paragraph 1(a)(ii) of the Torquay Protocol; but most contracting parties do not accept this contention ...".²⁸

The 1988 Panel Report on "Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies" examined a claim by Canada that the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act 1928 constituted "existing legislation" under paragraph 1(b) of the PPA. "The Panel noted that the CONTRACTING PARTIES had decided in August 1949 that this paragraph only referred to legislation of a mandatory character The Panel concluded that the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act did not make mandatory restrictions on points of sale and discriminatory listing requirements."²⁹

The 1989 Panel on "Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Apples and Pears" examined a seasonal restriction programme for apples and pears operated by Norway under a licensing scheme. According to Norway, the system of restrictive licensing was covered by the "existing legislation" clause in the Protocol of Provisional Application because it implemented parliamentary acts predating the Protocol.

"The Panel further recalled that paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol had in various circumstances in the past been interpreted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES so as to further the full application of the General Agreement. ...

"(a) In a report approved by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 10 August 1949, a Working Party agreed that the existing legislation clause applied only to:

'legislation which is of a mandatory character by its terms or expressed intent - that is, it imposes on the executive authority requirements which cannot be modified by executive action' (BISD II/49, paragraph 99, at 62).

"This position was on several occasions reconfirmed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES ... The Panel noted that the parties to the present dispute agreed that this interpretation applied in the present case.

"(b) [The Panel referred to the Panel report on the Manufacturing Clause, as cited below.]

"It follows from the foregoing that to be eligible as "existing legislation" under the Protocol, such legislation must:

"(a) be legislation in a formal sense,

The 1990 Panel Report on "United States - Restrictions on the Importation of Sugar and Sugar-Containing Products applied under the 1955 Waiver and under the Headnote to the Schedule of Tariff Concessions" notes that "Germany had obtained a waiver for the restrictions but nevertheless insisted that they were covered by the existing legislation clause in the protocol by which it acceded to the General Agreement". 37S/228, 260 para. 5.19.

²⁹L/6304, adopted on 22 March 1988, 35S/37, 91, para. 4.28.

“(b) predate the Protocol and

“(c) be mandatory in character by its terms or expressed intent.

“The Panel then proceeded to examine the 1934 Act and the other declarations cited by Norway in the light of these criteria.

“The Panel recalled that Norway argued that, under the constitutional system of Norway, the executive authorities had no option but to restrict imports of apples and pears on the basis of the 1934 Act, after the agricultural policies to be followed by the executive authorities had been defined in the Common Political Programme of 1945 and the Government’s principles of agricultural policies had been endorsed in the Storting in 1947. ...

“In relation to the legislative measures relied upon by Norway, the Panel noted that the application of the 1946 Act (Annex II), which had prohibited all imports save those for which the King had granted express dispensation, was discontinued on the occasion of the introduction of a revised system of import licensing in 1958. The 1934 Act (Annex I) was then revived as the basis for import licensing. The relevant part of the 1934 Act provided that the ‘King can decide that ... it should be prohibited to import from abroad ... articles or goods, indicated by the King ...’. Under the terms of this Act, the King had discretion to prohibit the import of any commodity. The Panel found nothing in the text of the 1934 Act expressing the intent of rendering the institution of such restrictions mandatory. The Panel recalled that in fact no import restrictions relating to apples and pears had been based on the 1934 Act before the year 1958, restrictions in force before that period having resulted from the 1946 Act. According to its terms, the 1934 Act is enabling, not mandatory in character and can for this reason not be considered as being covered by the existing legislation clause.

“As for the Common Political Programme of 1945 (Annex III) and the Government’s White Paper No. 10 (Annex IV), endorsed by the Storting on the occasion of the adoption of the National Budget in 1947, the Panel concluded from the documents and from the explanations provided by Norway that these documents and the discussions which ensued in the Storting had in fact no bearing on import restrictions as such and contained no reference to the subject matter of the present dispute, i.e. import restrictions to be imposed on apples and pears. Though political guidelines could possibly be inferred from them, they could not be considered to be legislation conforming to the criteria enumerated in paragraph 5.7 above, and therefore could not fall within the meaning of the Protocol.

“As for the various developments in the field of agricultural policy which took place after 1947, such as the ‘Basic Agricultural Agreement’ concluded in 1950 and supplemented since by periodic medium-term agreements, several White Papers presented by the Government and recommendations of a Storting Committee, which have been relied upon by Norway (see Annexes V, VI, VII and XII), the Panel noted that these could have no relevance to the application of the existing legislation clause, since they occurred after the date of the Protocol.

“For the reasons stated above, the evidence presented by Norway on the state of the legislation that existed on 30 October 1947 did not show that the Norwegian system of restrictive licensing of the import of apples and pears was based on legislation eligible under the paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol”.³⁰

The Panel on “Thailand - Restrictions on Importation of and Internal Taxes on Cigarettes” examined whether Thailand’s Protocol of Accession exempted measures taken under Section 27 of the Tobacco Act from the application of Article XI:1. Thailand argued that the intent of the Tobacco Act was to restrict imports of cigarettes and that it was therefore mandatory. Section 27 of the Tobacco Act provided that “the importation ... of tobacco is prohibited except by licence of the Director-General”.

“The Panel noted that, while the Tobacco Act was legislation in the formal sense and predated the Protocol of Accession of Thailand, it did not, by its terms or expressed intent, impose on the Thai executive authorities a requirement to restrict imports that could not be modified by executive action. On the contrary, Section 27 of the Act explicitly gives the Thai executive authorities the power to grant import licences. The Panel therefore found that the existing legislation clause in Thailand's Protocol of Accession did not exempt the restrictions on the importation of cigarettes from Thailand's obligations under the General Agreement."³¹

The 1992 Panel on "Canada - Import, Distribution and Sale of Certain Alcoholic Drinks by Provincial Marketing Agencies" examined, inter alia, the argument of Canada that the authorization of private sale of domestic beer in Ontario was covered by paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol. The Ontario Liquor Control Act, which had been in effect on 30 October 1947, restricted the sale of beer in Ontario to sales by the liquor board and sales by federally-licensed Canadian brewers "duly authorized by the dominion of Canada". In Canada's view, this legislation made mandatory a prohibition on authorizing foreign brewers to sell beer in Ontario except through the liquor board.

"The Panel noted that the Ontario Liquor Control Act in effect on 30 October 1947 had been the legal basis for authorizing the on-site brewery outlets in Ontario, of which there were now 23 The legal basis for authorizing the brewers' retail stores, of which there were now 473 ... was Section 3(e) of the Liquor Control Act introduced in 1980, which empowered the liquor board to authorize Brewers Warehousing Company Limited 'to operate stores for the sale of beer to the public'. The Panel concluded from this that Canada's arguments relating to the Protocol of Provisional Application could apply only to the on-site outlets but not to the brewers' retail stores. The Panel further noted that it had been determined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES that a measure was covered by paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol of Provisional Application only if "the legislation on which it is based is by its terms or expressed intent of a mandatory character - that is, it imposes on the executive authority requirements which cannot be modified by executive action". (II/62) The Ontario Liquor Control Act, as amended to July 1947, provided in Section 46 that 'The [Liquor Control Board of Ontario] may, with the approval of the Minister and subject to the provisions of this Act, and to the regulations made thereunder grant a license to any brewer duly authorized by the Dominion of Canada authorizing such brewer or any lawfully appointed agent of such brewer, ...

(c) to keep for sale and sell beer under the supervision and control of the Board and in accordance with this Act and the regulations.' (emphasis supplied).

"The Panel noted that the Liquor Control Act, by its terms, enabled the Dominion of Canada to authorize Canadian brewers to sell beer but it did not mandatorily require it to do so and that Canada had not claimed that the Act, by its terms or expressed intent, prevented the liquor board from withdrawing the authorizations granted. The Panel therefore found that the Act did not require the executive authority to accord domestic beer treatment more favourable than that accorded to imported beer and that the discriminatory restrictions on access to points of sale imposed by Canada in Ontario were consequently not covered by paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol of Provisional Application."³²

The 1992 Panel on "United States - Measures Affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages" examined, inter alia, the United States contention that the state distribution requirements of certain states, even if inconsistent with Article III, were covered by the "existing legislation" clause of the Protocol of Provisional Application. After a recital of the decisions listed above,

"The Panel then proceeded to examine the contention of the United States that existing mandatory legislation in the United States included legislation at the state level. The Panel first considered whether, in view of the fact that the United States had accepted the PPA as a federal Executive Agreement, the state distribution requirements concerned could be considered 'mandatory legislation' in the sense of the PPA. The Panel noted in this respect that both parties agreed that under United States constitutional law GATT law is part of United States federal law and, being based on the Commerce Clause of the Constitution, overrides, as a general matter, inconsistent state law. This was also the view of two eminent writers on the law of the GATT, Professors John Jackson and Robert Hudec. ...

"The Panel considered that assuming that United States federal law, including the GATT as part of federal law, in general overrides inconsistent state legislation, it was still necessary in the present case to examine whether United States federal law, including the GATT, overrides inconsistent state liquor laws based on the Twenty-first Amendment of the United States Constitution which grants substantial regulatory powers to the states in respect of alcoholic beverages. Based on the submissions of the parties, the Panel found that there is evidence supporting the conclusion that this is the case: that is, the Twenty-First Amendment grants broad police powers to the states to regulate the distribution and sale of alcoholic beverages but does not grant the states powers to protect in-state producers of alcoholic beverages against imports of competing like products.

"The Panel noted that this conclusion is supported by various decisions of the United States Supreme Court, to which Canada and the United States referred in their submissions.³³ ...

"Judging from the evidence submitted to this Panel, and in particular that of the various cases before the United States Supreme Court, the Panel considered that the United States has not demonstrated that its state laws inconsistent with Article III impose requirements which the United States could not change, or indeed has not already overruled, by executive action, including, in this case, acceptance by the United States of the obligations under the General Agreement as part of United States federal law. The Panel thus found that the record does not support the conclusion that the inconsistent state liquor legislation at issue in this proceeding is 'mandatory existing legislation' in terms of the PPA."³⁴

During consideration of this Panel Report at the June 1992 Council meeting, the representative of the United States stated that "While the United States would not oppose adoption of the Panel report, it would enter for the record a formal reservation" regarding these paragraphs.³⁵

(c) Modification of "existing legislation"

The Working Party report, adopted on 30 June 1949, on "Brazilian Internal Taxes" recognized that legislation inconsistent with Part II of the General Agreement could be modified without losing its status of "existing legislation" provided the degree of inconsistency with the General Agreement was not increased. The prevailing view was "that the Protocol of Provisional Application limited the operation of Article III only in the sense that it permitted the retention of an absolute difference in the level of taxes applied to domestic and imported products, required by existing legislation, and that no subsequent change in legislation should have the effect of increasing the absolute margin of difference".³⁷

The Panel report on "United States Manufacturing Clause" noted that

"... the central point of difference between the two parties to the dispute related to whether the Manufacturing Clause, despite the postponement by legislation of July 1982 of the expiry date of 1 July 1982 inserted in the Clause in 1976, could still qualify as 'existing legislation' under the Protocol of Provisional Application.

³⁷GATT/CP.3/42, adopted on 30 June 1949, II/181, 183, para. 12. The analysis of the margins of difference applied the definition of "margin of preference" in Article I:4.

“... The Panel, noting that the Manufacturing Clause had been amended on 13 July 1982, first asked itself whether the mere fact that the Clause had been amended after 30 October 1947 meant that it had lost the cover of the ‘existing legislation’ provision of the Protocol of Provisional Application. ... The Panel ... noted that one of the basic purposes of the provisional application of Part II of the GATT had been to ensure that the value of tariff concessions was not undermined by new protective legislation. To permit changes to ‘existing legislation’ that did not increase the degree of inconsistency of such legislation with the General Agreement would thus be in accordance with this purpose of the Protocol of Provisional Application. The Panel therefore considered that changes to the Manufacturing Clause that did not alter its degree of inconsistency with the General Agreement, or which constituted a move towards a greater degree of consistency, would not cause it to cease to qualify as ‘existing legislation’ in terms of paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol of Provisional Application. In this regard, the Panel noted with satisfaction that certain of the amendments made by the United States since 1947 to the Manufacturing Clause had reduced its degree of inconsistency with the General Agreement.

“The Panel then asked itself whether or not the legislation of 13 July 1982 postponing the expiry date of the Manufacturing Clause had merely amended the Manufacturing Clause without increasing its degree of inconsistency with the General Agreement. The Panel considered that the answer to this question depended on whether the introduction by the United States in 1976 of an expiry date of 1 July 1982 for the Manufacturing Clause had constituted a move towards GATT conformity, which had been reversed by the 1982 legislation, or whether the 1976 amendment had represented only an announcement of the possibility of a future move. The Panel considered that the response to this question depended in turn on whether, in the circumstances of the particular case, the insertion of the expiry date could justifiably have been considered by trading partners as a change in United States policy (with delayed implementation) or merely as the announcement of the possibility of a future change in policy. After a careful evaluation of the evidence before it, in particular of the evidence in paragraphs 24-29, and having regard to the fact that the expiry date inserted in the Clause in 1976 was the first such provision introduced since the legislation came into force in 1891, the Panel found that the European Communities had been justified in reaching the conclusion that the expiry date inserted in 1976 had constituted a policy change. The Panel therefore found that the insertion of the expiry date of 1 July 1982 for the Manufacturing Clause by Public Law 94-553 had represented a move towards greater GATT conformity. In consequence, the Panel further found that the legislation of 13 July 1982 postponing this expiry date had, in the circumstances of this particular case, constituted a reversal of this move towards greater GATT conformity and, therefore, increased the degree of inconsistency with the General Agreement of the Manufacturing Clause.

“The Panel then considered whether this increase in the degree of inconsistency with the General Agreement of the Manufacturing Clause could be justified in terms of paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol of Provisional Application because the postponement of the expiry date had not increased the degree of inconsistency to a level in excess of that which had existed on 30 October 1947. The Panel was of the view that the basic issue in this respect was whether the ‘existing legislation’ provision of the Protocol of Provisional Application should be interpreted as opening a ‘one-way street’ permitting only movements from the situation on 30 October 1947 to the situation required by Part II of the GATT or a ‘two-way street’ permitting also movements back towards the 1947 situation.

“Since the text of the Protocol itself and previous decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES concerning the Protocol are not clear on this point, the Panel examined which of these two interpretations would be in accordance with the purposes of the Protocol of Provisional Application and of the General Agreement. It noted that the Protocol had been conceived of as providing a temporary dispensation to enable contracting parties to apply Part II of the General Agreement without changing existing legislation or acting inconsistently with it. Given this purpose of the Protocol, the Panel believed that, once a contracting party had reduced the degree of inconsistency of ‘existing legislation’ with the General Agreement, there could be no justification for a subsequent move to increase the degree of GATT inconsistency of such legislation, albeit to a level not exceeding that which had existed on 30 October 1947. The Panel further noted that one of the basic aims of the General Agreement was security and predictability in trade relations among contracting parties. The Panel believed that it would not be consistent with this aim if contracting parties were free to reverse steps that had brought legislation inconsistent with GATT and justified under the Protocol of Provisional Application into line with the provisions of the General Agreement. The Panel therefore found that the Protocol of Provisional Application did not authorize contracting parties to enact legislation increasing the degree of GATT inconsistency of 'existing legislation', even if that degree of inconsistency remained not in excess of that which had obtained on 30 October 1947. The Panel therefore found that the United States legislation of 13 July 1982 postponing the expiry date of the Manufacturing Clause could not be justified under the Protocol of Provisional Application."³⁸

The Panel Report on "Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Apples and Pears" notes, regarding the "Manufacturing Clause" panel:

"... In a Panel report adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the Manufacturing Clause in the US copyright legislation, the scope of paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol was extensively considered. The basic issue before that Panel was whether the existing legislation clause should be interpreted as opening a one-way street permitting only movements from the situation on 30 October 1947 to the situation required by Part II of the General Agreement or a two-way street permitting also movements back to the 1947 situation. The Panel decided in favour of the "one-way street" principle arguing that the Protocol was designed to provide only a temporary dispensation from Part II, that the basic aim of the General Agreement was security and predictability in trade relations and that it would be inconsistent with that aim if contracting parties were free to reverse, at any time and at their discretion, the steps they had taken to bring their legislation into conformity with the General Agreement ...".³⁹

(d) Notification of "existing legislation" and other claims

The 1949 Report on "Notifications of Existing Measures and Procedural Questions" states that "there is no obligation on the part of a contracting party to notify a measure permitted by sub-paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol of Provisional Application", even if, in the absence of the Protocol, the measures could only be justified under a GATT provision requiring notification (such as Article XVIII).⁴⁰

In 1955, a request was made to contracting parties for information on their existing mandatory legislation which was not in conformity with Part II of the GATT. Of the thirteen that replied, seven countries indicated they had such legislation.⁴¹ At the time it was understood that this list was not exhaustive and that respondents were not bound by the list.

The Panel Report on "Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Apples and Pears" notes that "when in 1955 and 1958 the CONTRACTING PARTIES requested notification of legislation eligible under paragraph 1(b) of the Protocol, six contracting parties (Canada, Denmark, Germany, the United Kingdom, the United States and the Union of South Africa) notified legislative acts, whereas seven contracting parties (Australia, Ceylon, Finland, Japan, Pakistan, Rhodesia and Nyasaland) declared that they had no such legislation (see document L/2375/Add.1). Although the Panel recognized that there was no legal obligation to make such notification, it did note that Norway did not avail itself of the opportunity to notify on that occasion the Acts and declarations cited in the present dispute".⁴²

The Panel report, adopted on 16 November 1962, on "Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII" shows that out of the fifteen countries against which Uruguay had directed its complaints, six countries argued that certain measures were permitted under their respective Protocols of Accession or Provisional Application.⁴³ Also, during an examination of residual import restrictions in 1962, four countries stated that they considered that certain restrictions they applied to certain agricultural products were covered by their respective Protocols of Provisional Application or Accession.⁴⁴

e) Burden of proof with respect to “existing legislation”

The 1957 Working Party Report on “Import Restrictions of the Federal Republic of Germany” notes the following view of a number of delegations: “Should the Federal Government seek to maintain its claim that the Marketing Laws in fact require the maintenance of restrictions inconsistent with GATT provisions, the German delegation should produce the text of the Laws and particulars of the parliamentary discussions and explanatory material relating to the legislation in question to bear out its contention”.⁴⁵ See the examination of legislative provisions and intent cited above in the 1989 Panel Report on “Norway - Restrictions on Imports of Apples and Pears”.

The Panel on “United States - Measures affecting Alcoholic and Malt Beverages” examined, inter alia, the United States contention that certain requirements were covered by the “existing legislation” clause of the Protocol of Provisional Application. In this connection, the panel “noted that the United States, as the party invoking the PPA, has the burden of demonstrating its applicability in the instant case”.⁴⁶

2. Paragraph 2 of the Protocol of Provisional Application: Provisional application of the General Agreement in non-metropolitan territories

Paragraph 2 provides that the governments named in paragraph 1 shall make effective provisional application of the General Agreement in respect of any of their territories other than their metropolitan territories after giving notice thereof to the Secretary-General of the United Nations.⁴⁸ Notices under paragraph 2 were received from Australia (on behalf of Papua New Guinea), Belgium (on behalf of the Belgian Congo), France (on behalf of all overseas territories of the French Union listed in Annex B except Morocco), the Netherlands (on behalf of its overseas territories), and the United Kingdom (on behalf of Newfoundland, the Mandated Territory of Palestine, all territories for the international relations of which it is responsible except Jamaica, and later on behalf of Jamaica).⁴⁹ Statements concerning provisional application to specific territories also appear in certain accession protocols e.g. of Japan⁵⁰, Portugal⁵¹ and Spain.⁵²

Lists of territories in respect of which the General Agreement has been made effective were periodically compiled.⁵³ See also the material in this Index under Articles XXIV:1 and XXVI:5.

On 7 September 1948 the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided that “a government signatory of the Final Act of October 30, 1947 on behalf of which the Protocol of Provisional Application was not signed by June 30, 1948 shall not be considered to be a ‘party’ within the meaning of Article XXXIII of the General Agreement in its provisional application and consequently that any such government may accede to such Agreement pursuant to the provisions of Article XXXIII”.⁵⁵ The first government to accede to the General Agreement was Chile, which applies the General Agreement under the provisions of the Protocol for the Accession of Signatories of the Final Act of 30 October 1947.⁵⁶ The provisions of this special Protocol are similar to and refer to those of the Protocol of Provisional Application.

The General Agreement does not contain provisions which specifically address the admissibility of reservations. Nevertheless, some countries accepted the 1947 Protocol of Provisional Application under paragraph 3 subject to reservations, which have in due course lapsed or been withdrawn.⁵⁷

4. Paragraph 5 of the Protocol of Provisional Application and corresponding provisions of accession protocols: withdrawal of provisional application

It was stated at the Geneva session of the Preparatory Committee that the phrase “free to withdraw such application” meant “freedom to withdraw the whole arrangement and not part of it”, so that countries could not withdraw portions of their schedules.⁵⁸ Four contracting parties have notified their withdrawal of provisional application.⁵⁹ See also above under Articles XXVII and XXXI.

B. TERMINATION OF PROVISIONAL APPLICATION OF THE GENERAL AGREEMENT

On 8 December 1994, at their Sixth Special Session, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a Decision on “Transitional Co-existence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement”, which provides inter alia:

“The legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are herewith terminated one year after the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement. In the light of unforeseen circumstances, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may decide to postpone the date of termination by no more than one year.”⁶⁰

I. GENERAL

The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade was negotiated at an intermediate stage of the negotiations in 1946-1948 on the Charter of the International Trade Organization (ITO). The General Agreement has never entered into force, and has been provisionally applied by its contracting parties since 1 January 1948 under the Protocol of Provisional Application and other accession Protocols. Three principal bodies have been involved in the administration of the General Agreement: the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Council of Representatives, and the Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization. The CONTRACTING PARTIES also established a Committee on Trade and Development, given a special role in administering Part IV of the General Agreement.

The General Agreement does not as such provide for membership in an organization, but instead provides in paragraph 1 of Article XXV that “Representatives of the contracting parties shall meet from time to time for the purpose of giving effect to those provisions of this Agreement which involve joint action and, generally, with a view to facilitating the operation and furthering the objectives of this Agreement. Wherever reference is made in this Agreement to the contracting parties acting jointly they are designated as the CONTRACTING PARTIES.” The CONTRACTING PARTIES now meet in annual Sessions. Between sessions, business is conducted by the Council of Representatives, established in 1960 as a successor to the Inter-Sessional Committee. The Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (“ICITO”), established in 1948 to prepare for the entry into force of the ITO Charter, has furnished secretariat services to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

The Charter of the ITO never entered into force. The Review Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES held in 1954-55 reached an Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation (OTC) and also concluded a Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement. Neither of these instruments entered into force.¹

In the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, agreement was reached on the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization (“WTO Agreement”), which was opened for signature on 15 April 1994 at the Marrakesh Ministerial Meeting concluding the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations. The WTO Agreement entered into force on 1 January 1995. On 8 December 1994, the Preparatory Committee for the WTO meeting on the occasion of the Implementation Conference, and the CONTRACTING PARTIES meeting in Special Session, each decided that “The legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are herewith terminated one year after the date of entry into force of the WTO

¹The time-limit for signature of the Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the General Agreement expired on 7 April 1966; the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation did not receive the requisite number of acceptances for entry into force.

Agreement. In the light of unforeseen circumstances, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may decide to postpone the date of termination by no more than one year.² Accordingly, the provisional application of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (1947) will terminate on 31 December 1995 unless thus extended. Application of the GATT 1994 will continue, but solely within the framework of the WTO Agreement.

II. TRANSITION TO THE WTO

A. PREPARATORY COMMITTEE FOR THE WTO

The Final Act Embodying the Results of the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations provided in its paragraph 3 that "... Not later than late 1994, Ministers will meet, in accordance with the final paragraph of the Punta del Este Ministerial Declaration, to decide on the international implementation of the results, including the timing of their entry into force."³ The WTO Agreement does not provide for any fixed date of entry into force other than the one set at that implementation conference.

A Decision of Ministers also taken at the Marrakesh Ministerial Meeting established a Preparatory Committee for the World Trade Organization and set out its mandate, as follows:⁴

"Ministers,

"Having regard to the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization ..., and

"Mindful of the desirability of ensuring an orderly transition to the WTO and the efficient operation of the WTO as of the date of entry into force,

"hereby agree as follows:

"1. A Preparatory Committee for the WTO ... is hereby established. Mr. P.D. Sutherland in his personal capacity is appointed Chairman of the Committee.

"2. The Committee shall be open for membership to all Signatories of the Final Act of the Uruguay Round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations and to any contracting party eligible to become an original member of the WTO in accordance with Article XI of the WTO Agreement.

"3. A Sub-Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration, to be chaired by the Chairman of the GATT CONTRACTING PARTIES and a Sub-Committee on Services responsible for preparatory work on GATS matters are also established. The Committee may establish additional sub-committees as appropriate. Membership of the Sub-Committees shall be open to all members of the Committee. The Committee shall establish its own procedures and those of its sub-committees.

"4. The Committee will make all its decisions by consensus.

"5. Only those members of the Committee that are GATT contracting parties eligible to become original Members of the WTO in accordance with Articles XI and XIV of the WTO Agreement may participate in the decision-making of the Committee.

"6. The Committee and its sub-committees shall be serviced by the GATT Secretariat.

²PC/12, L/7583.

³The Ministerial Declaration on the Uruguay Round, adopted in Punta del Este, Uruguay on 26 September 1986 (Min.Dec., 3S/19), was divided into Part I (Negotiations on Trade in Goods) and Part II (Negotiations on Trade in Services), and final paragraph following Part II, entitled "Implementation of Results under Parts I and II" (3S/28). This final paragraph provided as follows: "When the results of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations in all areas have been established, Ministers meeting also on the occasion of a Special Session of CONTRACTING PARTIES shall decide regarding the international implementation of the respective results".

⁴Decision on the Establishment of the Preparatory Committee for the World Trade Organization, MTN.TNC/45(MIN), Annex IV.

“7. The Committee shall cease to exist upon the entry into force of the WTO Agreement, at which time it will forward its records and recommendations to the WTO.

“8. The Committee shall perform such functions as may be necessary to ensure the efficient operation of the WTO immediately as of the date of its establishment, including the functions set out below:

“(a) Administrative, budgetary and financial matters:

“To prepare recommendations for the consideration of the competent body of the WTO, or, to the extent necessary, take decisions or, as appropriate, provisional decisions in advance of the establishment of the WTO, with respect to the recommendations submitted to it by the Chairman of the Sub-Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration referred to in paragraph 3 above, in cooperation with the Chairman of the GATT Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration, assisted by proposals from the Secretariat on:

- “(i) the headquarters agreement provided for in Article VIII:5 of the WTO Agreement;
- “(ii) financial regulations, including guidelines for the assessment of WTO members' budget contributions, in accordance with the criteria set out in Article VII of the WTO Agreement;
- “(iii) the budget estimates for the first year of operation of the WTO;
- “(iv) the transfer of the property, including financial assets, of the ICITO/GATT to the WTO;
- “(v) the transfer and the terms and conditions of the transfer of the GATT staff to the WTO Secretariat; and
- “(vi) the relationship between the International Trade Centre and the WTO.

“(b) Institutional, procedural and legal matters:

- “(i) To carry out the examination of and approve the schedules submitted to it in accordance with the ‘Decision on Acceptance of and Accession to the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization’ and to propose terms of accession in accordance with paragraph 2 of that Decision;
- “(ii) To make proposals concerning terms of reference for the bodies of the WTO, in particular those established in Article IV of the WTO Agreement, and the rules of procedure which they are called upon to establish for themselves, bearing in mind paragraph 1 of Article XVI;
- “(iii) To make recommendations to the General Council of the WTO concerning the appropriate arrangements with respect to relations with other organizations referred to in Article V of the WTO Agreement; and
- “(iv) To prepare and submit a report on its activities to the WTO.

“(c) Matters related to the entry into force of the WTO Agreement and to the activities of the WTO within its scope and functions:

- “(i) To convene and prepare the Implementation Conference;
- “(ii) To initiate the work programme arising from the Uruguay Round results as set out in the Final Act, such as overseeing, in the Sub-Committee on Services referred to in paragraph 3 above, negotiations in specific services sectors, and also to undertake work resulting from Decisions of the Marrakesh meeting;

- “(iii) To discuss suggestions for the inclusion of additional items on the agenda of the WTO's work programme;
- “(iv) To make proposals concerning the composition of the Textiles Monitoring Body in accordance with the criteria set out in Article 8 of the Agreement on Textiles and Clothing; and
- “(v) To convene the first meeting of the Ministerial Conference or the General Council of the WTO, whichever meets first, and to prepare the provisional agenda thereof.”

In carrying out its task, the Preparatory Committee held 11 meetings during the period 29 April to 21 December 1994. Its Report, the Committee minutes and the minutes of its Sub-Committees are the permanent record of the Committee's work.⁵

B. IMPLEMENTATION CONFERENCE OF 8 DECEMBER 1994

The Implementation Conference was held on 8 December 1994 in Geneva, in conjunction with a Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.⁶ The Implementation Conference agreed that the WTO Agreement would enter into force on 1 January 1995, provisionally adopted the report of the Preparatory Committee, and adopted a number of decisions drawn up by the Preparatory Committee in pursuance of its mandate. These decisions responded to issues raised during the deliberations of the Preparatory Committee and to the desire to provide a smooth transition between the GATT 1947 and the WTO, including a firm termination date for the GATT 1947; sufficient time for signatories of the Final Act to become Members of the WTO and participants in the legal arrangements therein; and arrangements facilitating stability of legal and institutional relations during the period of simultaneous provisional application of the GATT 1947 and application of the WTO Agreement. The Preparatory Committee finished its work and adopted the final draft of its report on 21 December 1994.

1. Transition to GATT 1994

The WTO Agreement incorporates the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994, defined in Annex 1A of the WTO Agreement as follows:

“The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 (‘GATT 1994’) shall consist of:

“(a) the provisions in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, dated 30 October 1947, annexed to the Final Act Adopted at the Conclusion of the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment (excluding the Protocol of Provisional Application), as rectified, amended or modified by the terms of legal instruments which have entered into force before the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement;

“(b) the provisions of the legal instruments set forth below that have entered into force under the GATT 1947 before the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement:

- “(i) protocols and certifications relating to tariff concessions;
- “(ii) protocols of accession (excluding the provisions (a) concerning provisional application and withdrawal of provisional application and (b) providing that Part II of GATT 1947 shall be applied provisionally to the fullest extent not inconsistent with legislation existing on the date of the Protocol);

⁵See documents PC/M/1-11, PC/BFA/M/1-2, PC/IPL/M/1-11, PC/SCS/M/1-6 and PC/SCTE/M/1-5; the documents of the Preparatory Committee and its subsidiary bodies are listed in PC/R/Add.1.

⁶The conference was held at the level of heads of delegation, this having been decided at the Marrakesh Ministerial Meeting; see MTN.TNC/45(MIN).

- “(iii) decisions on waivers granted under Article XXV of GATT 1947 and still in force on the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement⁷;
- “(iv) other decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to GATT 1947;
- “(c) the Understandings set forth below:
 - “(i) Understanding on the Interpretation of Article II:1(b) of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994;
 - “(ii) Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XVII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994;
 - “(iii) Understanding on Balance-of-Payments Provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994;
 - “(iv) Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994;
 - “(v) Understanding in Respect of Waivers of Obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994;
 - “(vi) Understanding on the Interpretation of Article XXVIII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994; and
- “(d) the Marrakesh Protocol to GATT 1994. ...”

Article II:4 of the WTO Agreement provides that “The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1994 as specified in Annex 1A (hereinafter referred to as ‘GATT 1994’) is legally distinct from the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, dated 30 October 1947, annexed to the Final Act Adopted at the Conclusion of the Second Session of the Preparatory Committee of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment, as subsequently rectified, amended or modified (hereinafter referred to as ‘GATT 1947’).”

2. Decision on Transitional Co-existence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement

On 8 December 1994, the Preparatory Committee, meeting on the occasion of the Implementation Conference, adopted the following Decision on “Transitional Co-existence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement”. The CONTRACTING PARTIES meeting in Special Session on the same date also adopted this decision.

“The PREPARATORY COMMITTEE FOR THE WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION

“invites the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade 1947 to take the following decision:

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (hereinafter referred to as ‘GATT 1947’),

“Noting that not all contracting parties to the GATT 1947 meeting the conditions for original membership in the World Trade Organization ... will be able to accept the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the WTO ... as of its date of entry into force, and that the stability of multilateral trade relations would therefore be furthered if the GATT 1947 and the WTO Agreement were to co-exist for a limited period of time;

⁷Footnote 1 to this text provides that “The waivers covered by this provision are listed in footnote 7 on pages 11 and 12 in Part II of document MTN/FA of 15 December 1993 and in MTN/FA/Corr.6 of 21 March 1994. The Ministerial Conference shall establish at its first session a revised list of waivers covered by this provision that adds any waivers granted under GATT 1947 after 15 December 1993 and before the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement, and deletes the waivers which will have expired by that time.”

“Considering that, during that period of co-existence, a contracting party which has become a Member of the WTO should not be under a legal obligation to extend the benefits accruing solely under the WTO Agreement to contracting parties that have not yet become WTO Members and should have the right to act in accordance with the WTO Agreement notwithstanding its obligations under the GATT 1947;

“Desiring to end the period of co-existence on a date agreed in advance so as to provide predictability for policy makers and facilitate an orderly termination of the institutional framework of the GATT 1947;

“Decide as follows:

“1. The contracting parties that are Members of the WTO may, notwithstanding the provisions of the GATT 1947,

“(a) accord to products originating in or destined for a Member of the WTO the benefits to be accorded to such products solely as a result of concessions, commitments or other obligations assumed under the WTO Agreement without according such benefits to products originating in or destined for a contracting party that has not yet become a Member of the WTO; and

“(b) maintain or adopt any measure consistent with the provisions of the WTO Agreement.

“2. The provisions of Article XXIII of the GATT 1947 shall not apply:

“(a) to disputes brought against a contracting party which is a Member of the WTO if the dispute concerns a measure that is identified as a specific measure at issue in a request for the establishment of a panel made in accordance with Article 6 of the Understanding on Rules and Procedures Governing the Settlement of Disputes in Annex 2 of the WTO Agreement and the dispute settlement proceedings following that request are being pursued or are completed; and

“(b) in respect of measures covered by paragraph 1 above.

“3. The legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are herewith terminated one year after the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement. In the light of unforeseen circumstances, the CONTRACTING PARTIES may decide to postpone the date of termination by no more than one year.”⁸

3. Other decisions of 8 December 1994 on institutional matters

Further concerning the institutional functioning of the GATT 1947 and the WTO during the period of coexistence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO, on 8 December 1994 the Preparatory Committee at the Implementation Conference and the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted the following decision on “Transitional Arrangements: Avoidance of Procedural and Institutional Duplication”:

“The PREPARATORY COMMITTEE FOR THE WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION

“Noting that the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (hereinafter referred to as “GATT 1947”) and the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization (hereinafter referred to as “WTO

⁸PC/12, L/7583.

Agreement") are legally distinct and that Members of the WTO may therefore remain contracting parties to the GATT 1947;

"Considering that contracting parties to the GATT 1947 and parties to the Tokyo Round Agreements that are also Members of the WTO should not be subjected to the inconvenience of having to notify and consult on their measures and policies twice;

"Desiring, therefore, that the bodies established under the GATT 1947, the Tokyo Round Agreements and the WTO Agreement coordinate their activities to the extent that their functions overlap;

"Decides to propose the following procedures for adoption by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT 1947, the Committees established under the Tokyo Round Agreements and the General Council of the WTO:

"In the period between the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement and the date of the termination of the legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 and of the Tokyo Round Agreements the following notification and coordination procedures shall apply under the GATT 1947, the Tokyo Round Agreements and the WTO Agreement:

"1. If a measure is subject to a notification obligation both under the WTO Agreement and under the GATT 1947 or a Tokyo Round Agreement, the notification of such a measure to a WTO body shall, unless otherwise indicated in the notification, be deemed to be also a notification of that measure under the GATT 1947 or the Tokyo Round Agreement. Any such notification shall be circulated by the WTO Secretariat simultaneously to the Members of the WTO and to the contracting parties to the GATT 1947 and/or the parties to the Tokyo Round Agreement. These procedures are without prejudice to any notification procedures applicable in specific areas.

"2. The coordination procedures set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 below shall apply in the relations between the bodies referred to in sub-paragraphs (a) to (d) below:

"(a) The following Committees established under the GATT 1947 or a Tokyo Round Agreement shall coordinate their activities with the corresponding Committees established under the WTO Agreement:

Committee on Trade and Development,
Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions,
Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices,
Committee on Customs Valuation,
Committee on Import Licensing,
Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures,
Committee on Technical Barriers to Trade.

"(b) The Committee on Tariff Concessions and the Technical Group on Quantitative Restrictions and Other Non-Tariff Measures of the GATT 1947 shall coordinate their activities with the WTO Committee on Market Access proposed to be established.

"(c) The Working Parties established under the GATT 1947 to examine a regional agreement or arrangement shall coordinate their activities with Working Parties of the WTO that examine the same regional agreement or arrangement.⁹

"(d) The GATT 1947 Council of Representatives shall coordinate its trade policy reviews with those of the WTO Trade Policy Review Body.

⁹The Working Parties of the WTO include Working Parties originating from decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT 1947 that were adopted before the entry into force of the WTO Agreement and therefore form part of the GATT 1994.

“3. The bodies established under the GATT 1947 or a Tokyo Round Agreement that are referred to in paragraph 2 above shall hold their meetings jointly or consecutively, as appropriate, with the corresponding WTO bodies. In meetings held jointly the rules of procedure to be applied by the WTO body shall be followed. The reports on joint meetings shall be submitted to the competent bodies established under the GATT 1947, the Tokyo Round Agreements and the WTO Agreement.

“4. The coordination of activities in accordance with paragraph 3 above shall be conducted in a manner which ensures that the enjoyment of the rights and the performance of the obligations under the GATT 1947, the Tokyo Round Agreements and the WTO Agreement and the exercise of the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT 1947, the Committees established under the Tokyo Round Agreements and the bodies of the WTO are unaffected.

“5. The CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT 1947, the Committees established under the Tokyo Round Agreements and the General Council of the WTO may decide independently to terminate the application of the provisions set out in paragraphs 1 to 4 above.”¹⁰

On the same date, the Preparatory Committee and the CONTRACTING PARTIES each adopted the following decision on “Participation in Meetings of WTO Bodies by Certain Signatories of the Final Act Eligible to Become Original Members of the WTO”:

“During a period of seven months following the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement Signatories of the Final Act Embodying the Results of the Uruguay Round that are contracting parties to the GATT 1947 as of the date of this Decision and are eligible to become original Members of the WTO

“– may be present and speak at formal or informal meetings of the bodies established under the WTO Agreement other than the Textiles Monitoring Body, and “– shall have access to all documents made available to Members of the WTO for such meetings.

“Such Signatories shall not have the right to participate in the decision-making of the bodies established under the WTO Agreement.”¹¹

See also the material on transition to the WTO under Articles I, VI and XXIII.

In addition, on 8 and 9 December 1994 the Preparatory Committee, the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the Executive Committee of ICITO adopted an Agreement on Transfer of Assets, Liabilities, Records, Staff and Functions from ICITO and the GATT to the WTO; see further at page 1123 below.

The WTO Agreement entered into force on 1 January 1995.

III. GATT 1947 BODIES

A. CONTRACTING PARTIES

1. Establishment, membership, functions and terms of reference

As noted above, the CONTRACTING PARTIES consist of the contracting parties to the GATT “acting jointly”. Article XXXII provides that “The contracting parties to this Agreement shall be understood to mean those governments which are applying the provisions of this Agreement under Articles XXVI or XXXIII or pursuant to the Protocol of Provisional Application”. The contracting parties to the GATT have gained such status by accepting the Protocol of Provisional Application; by accepting a protocol of accession under Article XXXIII which provides for provisional application of the General Agreement; or by succession to contracting party status under Article XXVI:5(c). A list of contracting parties to the GATT appears in the appendix which follows this chapter.

¹⁰PC/11, L/7582.

Other authority for joint action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES is provided for in the following provisions of the General Agreement: II:6(a); VI:6(b) and (c); VII:1 and 4(c); VIII:2; X:3(c); XII:4(b) through (d) and 5; XIII:4; XIV:2; XV:1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8; XVI:5; XVII:4(c); XVIII:6, 7, 12, 14, 16, 19, 22; XIX:2, 3; XX:(h),(j); XXII:2; XXIII:2; XXIV:7,10; XXV:5; XXVII; XXVIII:1, 4; XXVIII bis:1; XXIX; XXX:2; XXXIII; XXXVII:2(b); XXXVIII:1, 2; Annex I, Interpretative notes Ad Articles XII:4, XVIII:15, 16, and XXVIII:1. See also the material under Article XXV in this book, including material on the drafting history of Article XXV.

At its meeting on 19 June 1992, the Council decided that the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should refrain from participating in the business of the Council.¹² At its meeting on 16-17 June 1993, the Council agreed in the light of United Nations General Assembly Resolution 47/1 to modify this decision as follows: "The Council considers that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) cannot continue automatically the contracting party status of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the GATT, and therefore decides that the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro) should apply for accession to the GATT and that it shall not participate in the work of the Council and its subsidiary bodies. The Council further invites other committees and subsidiary bodies of the GATT, including the Committees of the Tokyo Round Agreements and the Committee on Trade and Development, to take the necessary decisions in accordance with the above".¹³

2. Rules of Procedure

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have adopted Rules of Procedure for their sessions. The most recent consolidated text of the Rules of Procedure appears in the twelfth Supplement of the BISD, and reflects the most recent change to the Rules in 1964.¹⁴

3. Observer status

The Rules of Procedure for Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provide as follows:

Rule 8: "The representatives of countries signatories of the Final Act adopted at the conclusion of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment at Havana which have not become contracting parties may attend meetings in the capacity of observers participating in the discussions without vote."

Rule 9: "Representatives of other countries invited to the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment and of intergovernmental organizations may attend the meetings as observers on the invitation of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, and, on the invitation of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, participate in the discussions without vote in accordance with the terms of such invitation."

A Note of 15 June 1990 by the Secretariat on "Observer Status in GATT" notes these rules and states as follows:¹⁵

¹⁵C/173, p. 1-2; see also Note by the Secretariat of 27 June 1984 on the same subject, C/129. + Suppls.

“The United Nations has observer status. Also, certain of its specialized agencies and regional commissions, and several other international organizations, have been admitted as observers. ...

“International non-governmental organizations (NGOs) do not have ‘consultative status’ in GATT: none have been admitted as observers at sessions.

“The composition of observer delegations is left to the governments or international organizations concerned.”

A Decision of 21 July 1993 on “Observer Status of Governments in the Council of Representatives” provides, inter alia, that “Observer governments ... may participate as observers in Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES ...”.¹⁶ Consequently, countries not falling under Rule 8 are accorded observer status at sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES if they have observer status in the Council. See below at page 1103 concerning this decision and observer status in the Council.

In 1965, during the discussion of the request from the Republic of China (now known in the GATT as the Separate Customs Territory of Taiwan, Penghu, Kinmen and Matsu, or Chinese Taipei¹⁷) to be represented by observers at sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES stated that “Consistently ... with the practice of the United Nations, it was quite clear that for the CONTRACTING PARTIES to admit observers did not prejudice the position of the CONTRACTING PARTIES or of individual contracting parties towards recognition of the government in question. The Executive Secretary had based himself also upon the opinion of the Legal Department of the United Nations, which was that the question of representation in an international organization was distinct from the question of recognition of a government by other members of that organization”.¹⁸ In 1971, at the opening of the Twenty-seventh Session, the Chairman noted that in reaching their decision in 1965 to accede to the request of the Republic of China, the CONTRACTING PARTIES had agreed to follow decisions of the United Nations on essentially political matters, and suggested that the CONTRACTING PARTIES should follow the decision taken in United Nations Resolution 2758 (XXVI). It was agreed that for these reasons, representatives of the Republic of China should no longer attend sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES as observers.¹⁹ In the Council in 1992, in discussion of the establishment of a working party on accession of Chinese Taipei to the General Agreement, the Chairman of the Council noted that “as part of the understanding reached on this matter, the titles carried by [the representative of Chinese Taipei] would not have any implication on the issue of sovereignty”.²⁰

4. Election of officers

Rule 10 of the Rules of Procedure of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provides that “During the course of each regular session a Chairman, a First Vice-Chairman and two other Vice-Chairmen shall be elected from among the representatives. They shall hold office from the end of that session until the end of the next regular session”.²¹ In practice the Chairman and three Vice-Chairmen are elected at the annual Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

5. Procedures

(1) Convening of and circulation of agenda for sessions

(a) Regular sessions

Rule 1 of the Rules of Procedure provides that “Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall be held from time to time as required. The date of each session shall be fixed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES at a previous session”. Rule 2 provides that “The provisional agenda for each session shall be drawn up by the Secretary in consultation with the Chairman and shall be communicated to the contracting parties at least five weeks before the date of the meeting. It shall be open to any contracting party to propose items for inclusion in this provisional agenda up to six weeks from the date of meeting". As of the end of 1992, there had been forty-eight regular sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

The CONTRACTING PARTIES have occasionally met at Ministerial level.²²

(b) Special sessions

Rule 1 of the Rules of Procedure provides that "A session may, however, be held at another date on the initiative of the Chairman, or at the request of a contracting party concurred in by a majority of the contracting parties. Notice of the convening of any such session shall be given to contracting parties at least twenty-one days in advance of the session". As of July 1995, there had been seven special sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, most recently on 24 March 1995.²³ The Procedures for Future Appointment of the Director-General approved in 1986 provide that in the event of a vacancy during the term of office of the Director-General, the new Director-General should be appointed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES within six months from the date of the vacancy, if necessary at a special session convened for this purpose.²⁴

In view of this shorter advance notice for special sessions, the time-limits mentioned in Rule 2 have not been applied to special sessions. In practice, the date and provisional agenda have been determined by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the basis of consultations with the contracting parties and the Secretariat, and the Secretariat has provided as much advance notice as possible by circulating the notice convening the session and the provisional agenda simultaneously, at least twenty-one days in advance of the proposed date for the session.

(2) Conduct of sessions by Chairman

Rule 17 of the Rules of Procedure provides that "In addition to exercising the powers conferred upon him elsewhere by these rules, the Chairman shall declare the opening and closing of each meeting, shall direct the discussion, accord the right to speak, put questions to the vote, announce decisions, rule on points of order and, subject to these rules, have complete control of the proceedings. The Chairman may also call a speaker to order if his remarks are not relevant".

²²Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES at Ministerial level were held in Geneva from 26-30 October 1957 during the Twelfth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES; from 16-18 October 1959 during the Thirteenth Session; from 27-29 October 1959 during the Fifteenth Session held in Tokyo; from 27-30 November 1961 during the Nineteenth Session (adopting the Conclusions of the Meeting of Ministers, 10S/25); from 16-21 May 1963 (adopting the Action Programme and Ministerial Conclusions, 12S/36, and establishing the Trade Negotiations Committee for the Kennedy Round); during the Twenty-fourth Session in November 1967, following the conclusion of the Kennedy Round; from 12-14 September 1973 in Tokyo (adopting the Tokyo Declaration establishing the Trade Negotiations Committee for the Tokyo Round, 20S/19); from 26-29 November 1982 during the Thirty-eighth Session (adopting the Ministerial Declaration which appears at 29S/9); and in Punta del Este on 15-16 September 1986 (adopting the Punta del Este Declaration and establishing the Trade Negotiations Committee for the Uruguay Round; 33S/19). In addition the Trade Negotiations Committee met at Ministerial level from 4-6 May 1964 to mark the formal opening of the Kennedy Round and adopted the negotiating guidelines at 13S/109. On the convening of and agenda for ministerial meetings, see further CG.18/W/62, "Preparatory Work for Ministerial Meetings in the GATT", Secretariat Note dated 12 October 1981.

²³The first Special Session was held in Torquay on 29 March - 3 April 1951; it was convened by the Chairman at the request of a number of contracting parties in order to receive and act upon a suggestion to establish an inter-sessional working party to consider proposals directed toward the reduction of disparities in European tariffs (GATT/CP/99). The Second Special Session (which approved the text of Part IV of the General Agreement) was held in Geneva on 17-26 November 1964 and 8 February 1965; its convening was agreed at the twenty-first session (SR.21, p. 150). The Third Special Session was held in Geneva on 28 April 1980 at the level of heads of delegation and was convened by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to consider the appointment of a new Director-General on the retirement of Director-General Long. The Fourth Special Session was held in Geneva on 30 September - 2 October 1985 and was convened by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES at the request of the United States, this request having been concurred in by a majority of contracting parties (GATT/AIR/2180, GATT/AIR/2190). The Fifth Special Session was held in Geneva on 9 June 1993 at the level of heads of delegation and was convened by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to consider the appointment of a new Director-General on the retirement of Director-General Dunkel (GATT/AIR/3442). The Sixth Special Session was held in Geneva on 8 December 1994 at the level of heads of delegation to consider the implementation of the results of the Uruguay Round as provided for in the final paragraph of the Punta del Este Ministerial Declaration; see further at page above (PC/AIR/40, GATT/AIR/3652). The Seventh Special Session was held in Geneva on 24 March 1995 at the level of heads of delegation and was convened by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to consider the appointment of a new Director-General on the retirement of Director-General Sutherland.

²⁴L/6099, approved on 26 November 1986, 33S/55.

(3) Chairman's rulings

Rule 18 provides that "During the discussion of any matter, a representative may raise a point of order. In this case the Chairman shall immediately state his ruling. If his ruling is challenged, the Chairman shall immediately submit it for decision and it shall stand unless overruled". There are many examples of Chairman's rulings, particularly in the first ten years of the GATT.²⁵

(4) Decision-making, voting and consensus

(a) Voting majorities

Article XXV:3 states that "Each contracting party is entitled to have one vote at all meetings of the CONTRACTING PARTIES". Article XXV:4 states that "Except as otherwise provided for in this Agreement, decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES shall be taken by a majority of the votes cast". The preparatory work of the General Agreement also notes, in connection with the CONTRACTING PARTIES' power of concurrence under Article II:6 that "the concurrence regarding adjustment which is envisaged would require a simple majority vote as indicated by Article XXV".²⁶

Rule 28 of the Rules of Procedure provides that "Except as otherwise specified in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, decisions shall be taken by a majority of the representatives present and voting". The established practice of the CONTRACTING PARTIES is that a contracting party that abstains is not considered as voting.

Special majorities are called for in Articles XXIV:10, XXV:5 and XXXIII. Article XXIV:10 provides for approval by a two-thirds majority of proposals which do not fully comply with the requirements of Article XXIV:5-9. Article XXV:5 provides for waivers of obligations but requires that "any such decision shall be approved by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast and that such majority shall comprise more than half of the contracting parties. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may also by such a vote (i) define certain categories of exceptional circumstances to which other voting requirements shall apply for the waiver of obligations, and (ii) prescribe such criteria as may be necessary for the application of this paragraph". Article XXXIII provides for accession to the General Agreement and requires that such decisions be taken by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by a two-thirds majority.

(b) Voting procedure at Sessions

The Rules of Procedure do not specify how votes are to be taken. According to established practice, votes are taken either by ballot, or by the show of cards or a roll-call, or on a few occasions by show of hands.²⁷ A 1961 Note by the Executive Secretary on "Voting Procedures" states that "In view of the increasing number of occasions, at Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, when representatives are called upon to participate in formal voting, and in view of the difficulty of taking an accurate count of the votes cast when representatives are asked to raise cards, it is proposed that, in future, voting on decisions, declarations, etc., should be done by ballot. On each occasion when a formal vote is required, ballot papers will be distributed and a ballot box will be placed in the conference room. The result of each vote will be announced on the same or the following day and the ballot papers as well as the Executive Secretary's report will be available for inspection in the files of the Secretariat. It will of course remain open to any representative to request a vote by the raising of cards or, in accordance with normal practice, by roll call. The existing procedure for postal and telegraphic ballots during intersessional periods will still apply".²⁸

Nothing in the Rules of Procedure prevents a contracting party from requesting a secret ballot. It is up to the Chairman to decide whether to either accept a request by one contracting party for a secret ballot, or ascertain whether a majority would be in favour of such a ballot. At the 46th Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, in discussion of a request for a roll call vote on a waiver, "The Chairman recalled that the European Communities had asked for a roll-call vote, and noted that it was understood that contracting parties' representatives attended sessions with the necessary authority to perform the functions indicated in Article XXV of the General Agreement. Under the authority given to the Chairman in Rule 17, he then ruled that a roll-call vote be taken on this matter”.²⁹

(c) Postal and telegraphic voting

The record of the preparatory work of the General Agreement states that the phrase “majority of the votes cast” was used in Article XXV:3 of the General Agreement in order to permit postal and telegraphic voting as it was foreseen that there might be a need for continuous operation between formal sessions.³⁰ Accordingly, the CONTRACTING PARTIES have adopted rules for airmail and telegraphic ballots.³¹ Rule 5 of these rules provides that “The governments entitled to participate in an airmail or telegraphic ballot are those which are contracting parties at the time of the decision to submit the matter to a vote”.³² In May 1993, in discussion of a waiver request, the Council approved the text of the draft decision and recommended its adoption by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by a vote by postal ballot. In this connection the Council Chairman noted that “the decision, when and if adopted by a vote by postal ballot, would be circulated as usual ... Furthermore, the effective date of the Waiver Decision would be the date of its adoption. As representatives were aware, when voting by postal ballot, contracting parties were customarily given 30 days in which to cast their votes. Accordingly, the effective date of this decision would be the date at which the requisite majority was obtained, but not later than the thirtieth day following the present Council meeting”.³³

At the Fortieth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in November 1984, the United States requested that the vote on the US request for a waiver for the US Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act “be postponed until it could be taken under intersessional procedures which would allow all contracting parties to participate. The Chairman said that it was up to the United States, as the country requesting the waiver, to decide whether it wanted to put the request to a vote at the present session”.³⁴ At the Council meeting in December 1984, the “Chairman recalled that ... the United States had requested that the vote on this decision be postponed to the intersessional period when the balloting could be done by postal ballot, thereby enabling all interested contracting parties to participate. The CONTRACTING PARTIES had agreed to refer this matter to the Council for appropriate action in the light of the statements at the session”.³⁵ In reply to a question by Nicaragua whether such a remittance of the matter back to the Council was contrary to established GATT practice, “the Director-General said that there appeared to be no precedent for the procedure: nevertheless, the CONTRACTING PARTIES’ decision to refer this matter back to the Council had been taken in accordance with the applicable rules. ... the normal practice was for the Council to transmit decisions to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for adoption, but that there were also cases in which that process functioned in reverse. The passage of matters back and forth between the Council and the CONTRACTING PARTIES happened frequently. It seemed, however, that Nicaragua’s question referred to a specific type of action for which there appeared to be no precedent”.³⁶ The Council took note of the statements and recommended adoption of the draft decision by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by postal ballot.³⁷

(d) Consensus

The CONTRACTING PARTIES routinely take votes on decisions for waivers under Article XXV:5 and on accessions under Article XXXIII. However, regarding the practice of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in relation to other business, the Report of the Working Party on “Arrangements for Japanese Participation” notes that “... the CONTRACTING PARTIES do not usually proceed to a formal vote in reaching decisions; generally, the Chairman takes the sense of the meeting ...”.³⁸ Similarly, the decision on the participation of Switzerland in the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in connection with Swiss provisional accession was approved at the Thirteenth Session subject to an understanding which included the point that “In view of the wording of the provisions of Articles XXV and XXXII, it is not possible, from a strictly legal point of view, to give full voting rights to Switzerland. However, in the normal course of business this is not very important since the CONTRACTING PARTIES do not usually proceed to a formal vote in reaching decisions; generally the Chairman takes the sense of the meeting ...”.³⁹ The most recent recorded decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted by vote, other than decisions on waivers or accession, was in 1959.⁴⁰ Concerning the practice of consensus, see also the references below at page 1108 concerning decision-making in the Council.

(5) Relationship between the CONTRACTING PARTIES and Committees or Councils established under the Tokyo Round Agreements

A Decision adopted on 28 November 1979 on “Action by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the Multilateral Trade Negotiations” provides as follows:

“1. The CONTRACTING PARTIES reaffirm their intention to ensure the unity and consistency of the GATT system, and to this end they shall oversee the operation of the system as a whole and take action as appropriate.

“2. The CONTRACTING PARTIES note that as a result of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations, a number of Agreements covering certain non-tariff measures and trade in Bovine Meat and Dairy Products have been drawn up. They further note that these Agreements will go into effect as between the parties to these Agreements as from 1 January 1980 or 1 January 1981 as may be the case and for other parties as they accede to these Agreements.

“3. The CONTRACTING PARTIES also note that existing rights and benefits under the GATT of contracting parties not being parties to these Agreements, including those derived from Article I, are not affected by these Agreements.

“4. In the context of 1 and 3 above, the CONTRACTING PARTIES would receive adequate information on developments relating to the operation of each Agreement and to this end there will be regular reports from the concerned Committees or Councils to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may request additional reports on any aspect of the various Committees’ or Councils’ work.

“5. Further, the CONTRACTING PARTIES understand that interested non-signatory contracting parties will be able to follow the proceedings of the Committees or Councils in an observer capacity, and that satisfactory procedures for such participation would be worked out by the Committees or Councils”.⁴¹

Each of the Committees and Councils established under these agreements annually presents a report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which takes note of these reports. Each of these Committees and Councils has established rules on participation by observers.

B. INTERSESSIONAL COMMITTEE1. Establishment, Membership, Functions and Procedures

In order to ensure effective operation of the General Agreement between Sessions, the CONTRACTING PARTIES instituted intersessional procedures at an early date. These procedures included the provisions for mail and telegraphic ballots discussed above, and provisions for an Intersessional Committee.⁴²

The rules of procedure in effect just before the Committee was terminated provided that the Committee consisted of seventeen members, elected at the last session in each calendar year in such a manner that its composition reflected the criteria set out on page 201 of Volume II of the BISD. Contracting parties not members of the Committee or of a working party established by it could be represented by observers. The Committee was presided over by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The Committee met to deal with matters expressly referred to it by the CONTRACTING PARTIES and to deal with other matters requiring urgent action, including applications made under Article XVIII:A, C and D or XXVIII:4. The Committee was authorized to establish working parties and to make recommendations to the CONTRACTING PARTIES where a dispute had been referred to the Committee. The rules provided that the Committee would meet in Geneva on the call of the Executive Secretary, with at least ten days' advance notice.⁴³ This advance notice requirement could be seen as the forerunner of the Council's "ten-day rule" discussed at page 1105 below.

2. Termination

The Intersessional Committee was terminated by the Decision of 4 June 1960 of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which conferred upon the Council of Representatives, created by the same Decision, the specific functions previously delegated to the Intersessional Committee and to its Chairman under the Intersessional Procedures.

C. COUNCIL1. Establishment, functions and relationship with the CONTRACTING PARTIES

On 4 June 1960 at their Sixteenth Session, the CONTRACTING PARTIES terminated the Intersessional Committee and established the Council of Representatives with the following terms of reference:

"The functions of the Council shall be:

- "(a) To consider matters arising between sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES which require urgent attention, and to report thereon to the CONTRACTING PARTIES with recommendations as to any action which might appropriately be taken by them at the next regular session, at a special session which may be called by the Council, or by a postal ballot.
- "(b) To supervise the work of committees, working parties, and other subsidiary bodies of the CONTRACTING PARTIES operating intersessionally, providing guidance for them when necessary, examining the reports of such bodies, and making recommendations thereon to the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
- "(c) To undertake preparation for sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.
- "(d) To deal with such other matters with which the CONTRACTING PARTIES may deal at their sessions, and to exercise such additional functions with regard to matters referred to above, as may be expressly delegated to it by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, including action on behalf of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in performing functions under the provisions of the General Agreement, other than action under paragraph 5 of Article XXV, and under decisions and other formal actions taken by the CONTRACTING PARTIES".⁴⁴

From 1960 until 1968, decisions on matters under Article XXIII:2, including the adoption of panel reports, were made by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, acting on recommendations agreed by the Council.⁴⁵

The Report on Establishment of a Council of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which was also adopted on 4 June 1960, states that "It is not contemplated that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would delegate to the Council the power to grant a waiver from the provisions of the GATT. It would nevertheless be helpful if requests for waivers were examined by the Council and were then submitted with the Council's recommendations to the CONTRACTING PARTIES".⁴⁶

At their Twenty-fifth Session in 1968, the CONTRACTING PARTIES agreed to the suggestion of the Chairman that

"there should be possibilities of shortening considerably the agenda for the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the ordinary sessions, so that they could concentrate on matters of major importance. In recent years the amount of intersessional activity had increased to such an extent that the Council should give greater assistance to the CONTRACTING PARTIES in guiding the various Committees and Working Parties and, when necessary, in taking action.... The Council, in effect, had authority to take action on all matters of concern to the CONTRACTING PARTIES other than final decisions under paragraph 5 of Article XXV".⁴⁷

Since that time, the Council has handled all business other than final decisions on waivers. Panel reports under Article XXIII:2 have been adopted by the Council (acting for the CONTRACTING PARTIES) or have been adopted at the annual Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES when this would afford more timely action.

The Decision of 4 June 1960 also provides in paragraph 3 that:

"If a contracting party considers it is adversely affected by the exercise by the Council of any of its above functions which involve recommendations to individual contracting parties or the making of determinations or taking of decisions, it may suspend the operation of such action by the Council through the submission of a written appeal to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may, either generally or in particular cases or types of cases, provide that such recommendations, determinations of decisions of the Council shall become final if no appeal has been lodged within a specified reasonable period. In particular cases individual contracting parties may, either before or after action has been taken by the Council, waive their right of appeal and agree to accept the action as final".⁴⁸

2. Membership

The Decision of 4 June 1960 provides that the Council is "composed of representatives of all contracting parties willing to accept the responsibilities of membership therein". The Report on Establishment of a Council of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which was adopted at the same time, stated that "After exploring the various possibilities, the Group decided strongly in favour of a Council composed of all contracting parties which were able to make arrangements for effective participation through representation at an appropriate level. Thus, while proposing that there should be no numerical limitation on membership, the Group considers that contracting parties should not seek membership unless they could undertake to provide suitable representation ... it need not be laid down as a condition of membership that representatives must be resident in Geneva, provided they will be able normally to attend all meetings”.⁴⁹ A statement included in the Decision of 4 June 1960 provides further that “Membership in the Council is open also to governments which have acceded provisionally to the General Agreement. Groups of contracting parties are free to propose one or more of their members to participate in the Council. A contracting party not a member of the Council, which claims an interest in a matter under consideration by the Council and desires to be represented during the consideration of that matter, is co-opted as a full member for this purpose”.⁵⁰

At its meeting on 19 June 1992, the Council decided that the representative of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia should refrain from participating in the business of the Council; see the further decision above at page 1094 on the status of Yugoslavia as a contracting party.⁵¹

A list of members of the Council appears in the appendix which follows this chapter.

3. Observer status

At the first meeting of the Council in September 1960

“It was agreed that the following should be invited to be represented by observers at sessions of the Council:

“(a) governments, as follows: contracting parties and governments having acceded provisionally which were not members of the Council; governments associated with the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES through special arrangements or which had been invited to participate in the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES; and governments otherwise in the process of acceding or being associated with the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES;

“(b) inter-governmental organizations, as follows: International Monetary Fund, Organization for European Economic Co-operation, United Nations, other inter-governmental organizations directly interested in matters before the Council, and also the secretariats of regional associations for economic integration”.⁵²

At the May 1990 meeting of the Council, in connection with the former USSR’s request for observer status, the Chairman recalled this decision and noted that “Rules concerning the rights and obligations of observers were to be found in Rules 8 and 9 of the Rules of Procedure for Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES ... These rules foresaw that observers may attend meetings and participate in discussions without vote. Following these guidelines, the Council had in practice invited observers to speak after Council members had spoken on a particular point”.⁵³ The Council agreed to review the issue of the status of observers and their rights and obligations. A background note of 15 June 1990 by the Secretariat on “Observer Status in GATT” states as follows:⁵⁴

“Contracting parties are not ipso facto members of the Council, but can become so by simply announcing their wish to become members. Several contracting parties have not taken that step and are observers in the Council. ... A government which has acceded provisionally to the GATT can become a member of the Council without voting privileges (BISD 9S/7).

“Observers at sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES do not automatically have that status at meetings of the Council or its subsidiary bodies ... whenever any non-contracting party has sought observer status in the Council, the request has referred to the possibility of future accession, although as stated by the Chairman at the May 1990 Council meeting, the process relating to the accession of governments to GATT is subject to separate procedures.

“A number of governments apply the substantive provisions of the General Agreement on a de facto basis and, as such, are among the non-contracting parties invited as observers at sessions. ... In respect of observer status for meetings of the Council, however, these governments are treated like those of other non-contracting parties”.

The Note goes on to state, concerning subsidiary bodies of the Council:

“In a few instances, non-contracting party governments without Council observer status have been invited on an ad hoc basis to attend meetings of subsidiary bodies because of a direct involvement in the subject matter under discussion. This practice was followed in the case of the EEC Agreements with Algeria, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, when the Lomé Agreements were being examined, and in the case of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act. In such cases, the invitation has been made by the Council itself and not by the subsidiary body concerned.”⁵⁵

The consultations held on observer status resulted in the Decision adopted by the Council on 21 July 1993, on “Observer Status of Governments in the Council of Representatives”:

“Considering the desirability to provide for governments wishing to accede to the General Agreement an adequate opportunity to acquaint themselves with the GATT and its activities; and “Taking into account the need to further improve channels of communication and information between such governments and contracting parties;

The Council decides the following:

“1. Governments wishing to request Observer status in the Council should address to the CONTRACTING PARTIES a communication in which they express the intent to initiate negotiations for accession to the General Agreement within a maximum period of five years, and provide a description of their current economic and trade policies, as well as any intended future reforms of these policies. They should further indicate their acceptance of obligations or requirements, including financial obligations, that may be determined by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to apply to Observer governments in the Council.

“2. Observer status shall be granted initially for a period of five years. The purpose of observership is to allow a government to better acquaint itself with the GATT and its activities, and to prepare and initiate negotiations for accession to the General Agreement.

“3. During this period an Observer government should provide the CONTRACTING PARTIES with any additional information it considers relevant concerning developments in its economic and trade policies. At the request of any contracting party or the Observer government itself, any matter contained in such information may be brought to the attention of the Council after governments have been allowed sufficient time to examine the information.

“4. (a) If, at the end of five years, an Observer government has not yet initiated a process of negotiation with a view to acceding to the General Agreement, it may request an extension of its status as Observer. In order to do so, it shall submit to the Council a statement of the reasons for which it has not found it possible to initiate accession negotiations, as well as an indication of future plans in this respect. This communication should be accompanied by a comprehensive, up-dated description of its current economic and trade policies.

(b) Upon receiving such a request, the Council shall review the situation, and decide upon the extension of the status of Observer and the duration of such extension.

⁵⁵C/173, 15 June 1990, p. 3-4.

“5. Observer governments shall have access to the main GATT document series⁵⁶ and may participate as observers in Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES and meetings of working parties and other subsidiary bodies of the Council with the exception of the Budget Committee. They may also request technical assistance from the Secretariat in relation to the operation of the GATT system in general, as well as to negotiations on accession to the General Agreement.

“6. Upon their entry into force, the procedures contained in paragraphs 1 to 5 above shall apply as appropriate to all governments which are currently Observers to the Council, including those Observers which apply GATT on a de facto basis, except governments which are in the process of active negotiations on accession, or which are already contracting parties to the GATT.”⁵⁷

When this Decision was adopted, the Council Chairman noted that with regard to the observer status of international organizations in the Council, and of governments and international organizations at sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, it was his understanding, on the basis of the consultations he had held, that no further action was required at this stage. He also made the following clarifications: (a) all governments that were currently observers in the Council should provide information under paragraph 1 of the decision, unless they were deemed to have done so recently to a satisfactory extent; (b) the five-year period referred to in paragraph 2 of the decision would not apply retroactively to governments that were currently observers in the Council; and (c) the decision did not affect countries which applied the General Agreement on a de facto basis and which were not observers in the Council.⁵⁸ At its October 1993 meeting, the Council adopted a recommendation of the Budget Committee as from 1 January 1994, observer countries be requested to contribute each year, for services provided to them, 50 per cent of the minimum contribution applying to contracting parties. Administrative measures would apply to observers which did not pay.⁵⁹

In the Council in 1992, in discussion of the establishment of a working party on accession of Chinese Taipei to the General Agreement, the Chairman of the Council invited the delegation of Chinese Taipei to attend future meetings of the Council and of other GATT bodies as an observer during the period when the Working Party was carrying out its work. He noted that as part of the understanding reached on this matter, the titles carried by the representative of Chinese Taipei would not have any implication on the issue of sovereignty.⁶⁰

A list of observers in the Council appears in the appendix tables at the end of this book.

The Chairman of the Council is elected each year at the Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

5. Establishment of subsidiary bodies

The Decision establishing the Council provided that “The Council may establish such subsidiary bodies as it considers appropriate to carry out its functions in relation to the examination of questions before it, consultations with government, and the drafting of reports to the CONTRACTING PARTIES; the Council may also instruct inter-sessional bodies of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to conduct such activities for it.”⁶¹

6. Procedures

(1) Rules of procedure

The Decision establishing the Council provided that pending the adoption by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of permanent rules of procedure, the Council might determine its own provisional rules of procedure.⁶² The Minutes of the Council's first meeting on 19-23 September 1960 state that

"It was agreed that in view of the undesirability of committing the Council to rules of procedure in the initial stages of its existence, the Council would follow, so far as was necessary, the procedures which were followed for sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, subject to such adaptation of these rules as might be required from time to time. At some later date the Council could, if necessary, decide whether it needed its own rules of procedure".⁶³

No decision establishing formal rules of procedure for the Council has been taken to date.

At the June 1993 Council meeting, the Chairman proposed, and the Council accepted, certain supplementary practices to expedite the work of the Council:

"(a) Statements of support

"In order to expedite the conduct of Council business, the Chairman would invite delegations that wished to express their support for a given proposal -- such as the adoption of a report, support of a request for observer status, support for current activities such as technical assistance, and so on -- to show their hands, to be duly recorded by name in the Council Minutes as supporting statements; thus, only delegations with dissenting views or wishing to make explicit points or proposals would actually be invited to make a statement. This procedure would only be applied in situations of a routine nature, to avoid undue repetition of points already made, and would not preclude any delegation that so wished from taking the floor.

(b) Length of statements

"... Delegations ... should endeavour, to the extent that a situation permitted, to limit their statements to a maximum of 5 minutes. Delegations wishing to develop their position on a particular matter in fuller detail would be invited to circulate a written statement for distribution to Council members, the gist of which, at the delegation's request, could be reflected in the Council Minutes."⁶⁴

At the Fiftieth Session in 1994, the Chairman of the Council noted that "informal consultations held prior to Council meetings aimed to pave the way for achieving agreement on various issues, had ... proved a useful practice which he believed should continue and be intensified, as necessary, in future, within the WTO".⁶⁵

(2) Convening of and circulation of agenda for meetings

The Report on Establishment of a Council of the CONTRACTING PARTIES states that "The Group proposes that bi-monthly meetings of approximately one week should be envisaged. Thus, while there are two sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Council would meet in January and March, July and September. The Council would probably meet also just before and after each session and it would meet at other times as required, on the call of the Executive Secretary, at ten days' notice".⁶⁶ A Note by the Secretariat on "Airgrams convening Council meetings" provides as follows:

⁶²9S/8-9.

⁶³C/M/1, p. 2-3.

⁶⁴C/M/264; see also below under "Other Business".

⁶⁵SR.50/1, p. 4.

⁶⁶L/1200, p. 4.

“For over thirty years, the Council has followed the practice of convening its meetings by an airgram issued at least ten calendar days prior to the date set for the meeting. In the event that the tenth day falls on a weekend or a GATT holiday, the preceding GATT working day is retained for the purpose.

“The ‘ten-day rule’ has been reaffirmed at various times by Council Chairmen and delegations.⁶⁷ While this customary rule of procedure can be amended by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, or waived in specific cases, it has nearly always been adhered to, even on occasions when one or several delegations made urgent requests for convening an additional or ‘emergency’ meeting of the Council at short notice. The notable exception occurred in 1971 when nearly all delegations wanted a meeting to be held immediately to discuss a trade measure of one contracting party, which did not oppose the shortened notice for that particular meeting (cf. C/M/71).

“Requests for items to be placed on the agenda of a forthcoming meeting should be communicated in writing to the Secretariat, together with any accompanying documentation (one or two pages) to be issued in connection with that item, at the latest on the day before the airgram is to be issued. Longer communications intended for circulation as documents should, because of translation and printing requirements, be submitted two to three or more days before the deadline, depending on the nature and length of the text. Delegations should consult with the Council Secretary on a case-by-case basis to ensure that prospective documents can be issued in time.”⁶⁸

(a) Particular agenda items

In a number of instances decisions provide for specific items to be on the Council’s agenda.

A Decision of 25 October 1972 provided that “Without prejudice to the legal obligations to notify in pursuance of Article XXIV, the Council decides to invite contracting parties that sign an agreement falling within the terms of Article XXIV, paragraphs 5 to 8, to inscribe the item on the agenda for the first meeting of the Council following such signature, to the extent that the advance notice of ten days prescribed for inclusion of items on the agenda can be observed. Inclusion of the item should allow the Council to determine the procedures for examination of the agreement”.⁶⁹

The Decision of 12 April 1989 concerning “Functioning of the GATT System” provides, concerning the establishment of a trade policy review mechanism, that “Trade policy reviews will be carried out by the Council at periodic special meetings ... The Council will establish a basic plan for the conduct of the reviews ... The Council will establish a programme of reviews for each year in consultation with the contracting parties directly concerned”.⁷⁰

Also, the Decision of 12 April 1989 on “Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures” includes the following provisions relating to Council business.

- “Mutually agreed solutions to matters formally raised under GATT Articles XXII and XXIII, as well as arbitration awards within GATT, must be notified to the Council where any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto.”⁷¹

⁶⁷[Footnote to this text] “An early reference to this practice in GATT can be found in the rules of procedure of the Intersessional Committee, which preceded the Council (BISD 7S/7)”. See also discussion at page 1100 above; see also, e.g., SR.26/7 p. 70 (statement by Council Chairman that “Under normal circumstances the Council should not accept the inclusion of an item on its agenda unless it was clear that the necessary documentation would be ready a reasonable time in advance of the meeting so as to allow delegations time for serious preparation. Obviously there would be some cases from time to time when urgent action would be needed”).

- “If the complaining party so requests, a decision to establish a panel or working party shall be taken at the latest at the Council meeting following that at which the request first appeared as an item on the Council’s regular agenda, unless at that meeting the Council decides otherwise.”⁷²
- “In establishing a panel, the Council may authorize its Chairman to draw up the terms of reference of the panel ... If other than standard terms of reference are agreed upon, any contracting party may raise any point relating thereto in the Council.”⁷³
- “In order to provide sufficient time for the members of the Council to consider panel reports, the reports shall not be considered for adoption by the Council until thirty days after they have been issued to the contracting parties.”⁷⁴
- “Contracting parties having objections to panel reports shall give written reasons to explain their objections for circulation at least ten days prior to the Council meeting at which the panel report will be considered.”⁷⁵
- “The Council shall monitor the implementation of recommendations or rulings adopted under Article XXIII:2. The issue of implementation of the recommendations or rulings may be raised at the Council by any contracting party at any time following their adoption. Unless the Council decides otherwise, the issue of implementation of the recommendations or rulings shall be on the agenda of the Council meeting after six months following their adoption and shall remain on the Council’s agenda until the issue is resolved. At least ten days prior to each such Council meeting, the contracting party concerned shall provide the Council with a status report in writing of its progress in the implementation of the panel recommendations or rulings.”⁷⁶

(b) “Other business”

The Council agenda customarily includes an item for “Other business”; matters raised under this item do not appear in the advance airgram convening the meeting sent to delegations and to capitals. On a number of occasions, including the Council meeting on 11 July 1991, the Chairman has strongly encouraged representatives wishing to have a substantive discussion in the Council on any issues to bring them to the attention of the Secretariat in sufficient time so that they could be placed on the agenda in the airgram, rather than to raise them under “Other Business”.⁷⁷ At the June 1993 Council meeting, the Chairman made a statement containing certain proposals designed to expedite Council business, including the conduct of discussions under “Other Business”. He proposed, and the Council accepted, that:

“the Chairman would remind delegations at each Council meeting that discussions on substantive issues under ‘Other Business’ should be avoided, and that the Council should limit itself to taking note of the announcement by the sponsoring delegation, as well as any reactions to such an announcement by other delegations directly concerned;

“the Council Minutes, unless explicitly requested by the delegations concerned, would not reproduce at length the statements made under ‘Other Business’, but would be limited to an enunciation of the issues raised and a summary of the comments made;

“delegations should provide the Chairman or the Secretary of the Council and other delegations directly concerned, whenever possible, advance notice of ‘Other Business’ items.”⁷⁸

At the November 1994 Council meeting the Council accepted the Chairman’s further proposal as follows:

⁷²*Ibid.*, 36S/63, para. F(a). A footnote to this paragraph provides: “References to the Council, made in this paragraph as well as in the following paragraphs, are without prejudice to the competence of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, for which the Council is empowered to act in accordance with normal GATT practice (BISD 26S/215)”.

“the first item of business at a Council meeting would be statements by the Chairman which currently are made under ‘Other Business’;

“statements by delegations under ‘Other Business’ should be limited to very short announcements;

“exceptionally, when a delegation considers it must raise an extremely urgent matter of importance, the Chairman will allow a substantive statement to be made on the matter, which should nevertheless be limited to no more than five minutes; the delegation raising the matter, if it so wishes, may circulate for the record a longer statement in document form;

“all efforts should be made to avoid an extensive debate on any question under ‘Other Business’;

“if the regular Agenda of the Council is exceptionally long and the meeting runs out of time before ‘Other Business’ items have been taken up, the Chairman may defer consideration of these items to the next meeting of the Council, unless a delegation requests otherwise”.⁷⁹

On a very few occasions, discussions have been held in the Council before adoption of the agenda.⁸⁰

(3) Decision-making, voting and consensus

Consensus decision-making: The Decision of 4 June 1960 establishing the Council provided that “Pending further consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES of the question of voting, no action by the Council, other than action relating to its own procedures, may be taken by an affirmative vote of less than the absolute number of affirmative votes by which such action could have been taken by the CONTRACTING PARTIES under the relevant provisions of the General Agreement and the rules of procedure for sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.⁸¹ However, the practice in the Council has been to proceed on the basis of consensus.

At the March 1981 Council meeting, in concluding the debate on adoption of the Director-General’s report on working party discussions between the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the European Communities under Article XVI:1 of the possibility of limiting EEC subsidization of sugar exports, and on a draft decision proposed by Australia, the Council Chairman noted

“that in matters of this kind the Council normally proceeded on the basis of consensus. In his view, consensus was understood in GATT to mean that no delegation maintained its objections to a text or attempted to prevent its adoption. He felt that such a consensus did not presently exist in the Council on this matter: he noted that the ten contracting parties in the European Communities were not in agreement with the draft decision as presented by Australia. At the same time, however, he was also very conscious of the weight of opinion expressed by the delegations which had supported either the Australian text as such or its general sense; and he concluded that there was a general desire to arrive at a decision at the present meeting ...”.⁸²

A compromise text was adopted providing for a later review by the Council upon further notification of the EEC sugar regulations.⁸³

During the discussion noted below of the request by the United States for authorization of a panel on “European Economic Community - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins”,⁸⁴ the representative of Australia suggested a solution to the particular problem “in that consensus was not unanimity. His delegation believed that the Chairman could conclude that a consensus existed". The representative of India, supported by Brazil, Mexico, Jamaica and Peru stated that "his delegation had listened with interest to Australia's statement which did appropriately recognize the rights of a contracting party wishing to assert its rights as such. However he could not accept the Australian view that consensus could be determined by the Chairman even if there was no unanimity. If a contracting party chose to contest a consensus and to state as its position that a consensus did not exist, it was then not possible for the Chairman of any GATT body to conclude that a consensus did exist. As long as his assessment was not contested, any chairman could conclude that there was a consensus; but once that consensus was formally disputed, contested or objected to by a contracting party, the consensus could not be said to exist".⁸⁵

The Decision of 12 April 1989 on "Improvements to the GATT Dispute Settlement Rules and Procedures" provides as follows regarding Council decisions on adoption of panel reports:

"The parties to a dispute shall have the right to participate fully in the consideration of a panel report by the Council, and their views shall be fully recorded. The practice of adopting panel reports by consensus shall be continued, without prejudice to the GATT provisions on decision-making which remain applicable. However, the delaying of the process of dispute settlement shall be avoided."⁸⁶

During discussion at the April 1992 Council meeting of a request by Egypt for Council approval of a waiver for renegotiation of Egypt's Schedule, Egypt suggested that "if no consensus were possible, the Council should vote to approve the text of the draft waiver decision and to submit it for adoption by the CONTRACTING PARTIES by postal ballot". Many developed and developing contracting parties, including some which supported the waiver request, urged Egypt to reconsider its request so that a decision by consensus could be taken later. The representative of Switzerland stated that "In his view, a vote in the Council was a final recourse, to be taken when all other possibilities for reaching a consensus had been exhausted. That stage had not been reached on the matter at hand. No delegation had stated that it would firmly oppose the granting of the waiver without any reconsideration of its position. One had only heard requests for further information and for further time to consider the matter, and it could not be deduced therefrom that there was no possibility of a consensus. He hoped that all would continue to seek a consensus and not to force the situation by turning immediately to a vote". The representative of Mexico said "it was his understanding that a vote had never been taken in the Council as far back as one could recall. While contracting parties undoubtedly had the right to request a vote, one had to regard this more like an atomic weapon -- to be stored but not used. ... Mexico would be deeply concerned by any recourse to a vote; it would prefer by far that every effort be made in the GATT to reach decisions by consensus first". The representative of Colombia said that "no one would be happy in the end if this matter were put to a vote. While Colombia fully supported Egypt's waiver request, it believed that consensus should remain the way of decision-making in the Council".

The Chairman stated that "While the waiver decision itself would be taken by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in a vote by postal ballot, what was being proposed was that the Council vote on whether or not to approve and to send the draft decision to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for a vote thereon. That would be an extraordinary move, and he called on all to reflect on this". Following consultations with delegations, the Chairman reported that "there was a strong desire amongst Council members, including Egypt, to take a decision on the waiver request on the basis of a consensus".⁸⁷ The decision was so taken.

Representation of the EC: At the June 1988 Council meeting, in discussion of the request by the United States for authorization of a panel on "European Economic Community - Payments and Subsidies Paid to Processors and Producers of Oilseeds and Related Animal-feed Proteins",⁸⁸ France stated its opposition to panel establishment, stating that "there was no consensus among the CONTRACTING PARTIES at this stage with regard to the US request". The representative of the EC then agreed to establishment of the panel on behalf of the Community, and stated that "it was fair to commit to the records of the meeting the statement made by France, but, on behalf of the Community, he had said that he accepted a panel. As far as the Community was concerned, a panel would be legally established if the Council followed this consensus. He supported such a decision on behalf of the Community". He further stated that "The Community was present because competence with regard to trade policy had in fact been transferred to it by treaties. A contracting party could not raise an objection concerning something which no longer belonged to it as a government. The Community had assumed responsibility for trade policy on behalf of the member States; that was the guarantee and the security for other contracting parties. To take the French views into consideration would put into question all the current Community's obligations and rights. For these reasons, even when France spoke as a contracting party, its views as to trade policies were null and void and could not be taken into account".⁸⁹

The Council took note of the statements, agreed to establish a panel and authorized the Council Chairman to draw up the terms of reference and to designate the Chairman and members of the Panel in consultation with the parties concerned. The representative of France then said that "while the Chairman had concluded that a panel had been established as requested by the United States, there was no consensus for its establishment. France, as a contracting party, had to oppose its establishment". The Director-General said that "according to practices established a number of years earlier, and not just in the Council, the representative of the Community had the authority to commit the Community to a Council decision". The representative of France noted that "the Director-General had spoken of practices, not of contractual right".⁹⁰

Establishment

The Committee was established on 26 November 1964 during the Second Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, with the following terms of reference:

Terms of Reference

1. To keep under continuous review the application of the provisions of Part IV of the General Agreement;
2. To carry out, or arrange for, any consultations which may be required in the application of the provisions of Part IV;
3. To formulate proposals for consideration by the CONTRACTING PARTIES in connexion with any matter relating to the furtherance of the provisions of Part IV;
4. To consider any questions which may arise as to the eligibility of a contracting party to be considered as a less-developed contracting party in the sense of Part IV and to report to the CONTRACTING PARTIES;
5. To consider, on the basis of proposals referred to it by the CONTRACTING PARTIES for examination, whether modification of or additions to Part IV are required to further the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in the field of trade and development and to make appropriate recommendations; and
6. To carry out such additional functions as may be assigned to the Committee by the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

The Committee took over the functions of Committee III, of the Action Committee, and its subsidiary bodies and of the Working Party on Preferences.⁹¹

At their Thirty-fifth Session (November 1979), the CONTRACTING PARTIES decided that the rôle of the Committee on Trade and Development should be strengthened and should cover, inter alia:

1. Work on trade policy and development policies including trade liberalization in areas of special interest to developing countries;

⁸⁹C/M/222, discussion at p. 7-14.

⁹⁰*Ibid.*, p. 15-16.

⁹¹BISD 13S p. 75-76.

2. Primary responsibility for supervision of the implementation of points 1 and 4 of the “Framework” texts;
 3. Examination of protective action by developed countries against imports from developing countries;
 4. Work on structural adjustment and trade of developing countries;
- and
5. Special attention to the special problems of least developed countries.⁹²

It was also agreed that the CONTRACTING PARTIES, through the Committee on Trade and Development, should continue to follow developments with regard to a new round of trade negotiations among developing countries. The Committee has established a Sub-Committee on Trade of Least-Developed Countries and a Sub-Committee on Protective Measures.

The Chairman of the Committee is elected each year at the annual Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. The Committee reports annually to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which adopts its report. The responsibilities and activities of the Committee are further discussed in the chapter on Part IV.

The WTO Agreement provides for a Committee on Trade and Development, which was duly established by the WTO General Council at its first meeting on 31 January 1995, with terms of reference as agreed by the Preparatory Committee for the WTO the previous December.⁹³ See the chapter on Part IV. The Committee is also one of the bodies named in the Decision of 8 December 1994 on “Avoidance of Procedural and Institutional Duplication”; see page 1091 above.

E. WORKING PARTIES

1. Establishment, terms of reference and operation

Working parties may be convened either by the CONTRACTING PARTIES or by the Council. Paragraph 6 of the Annex to the Understanding Regarding Notification, Consultation, Dispute Settlement and Surveillance, adopted on 28 November 1979, provides:

“Concerning the customary elements of the procedures regarding working parties ... the following elements have to be noted:

“... working parties are instituted by the Council upon the request of one or several contracting parties. The terms of reference of working parties are generally “to examine the matter in the light of the relevant provisions of the General Agreement and to report to the Council”. Working parties set up their own working procedures. The practice for working parties has been to hold one or two meetings to examine the matter and a final meeting to discuss conclusions. Working parties are open to participation of any contracting party which has an interest in the matter. Generally, working parties consist of a number of delegations varying from about five to twenty according to the importance of the question and the interests involved. The countries who are parties to the dispute are always members of the Working Party and have the same status as other delegations. The report of the Working Party represents the views of all its members and therefore records different views if necessary. Since the tendency is to strive for consensus, there is generally some measure of negotiation and compromise in the formulation of the Working Party’s report. The Council adopts the report. The reports of working parties are advisory opinions on the basis of which the CONTRACTING PARTIES may take a final decision”.⁹⁴

⁹⁴L/4907, adopted on 28 November 1979, 26S/210, 216-217, para. 6(i).

As noted above at page 1108, in March 1981 the Council adopted the Director-General's report on a working party which had discussed with the EC the possibility of limiting subsidization of sugar. At the July 1981 Council meeting, a number of delegations sought to have this review conducted by reconvening the working party. The representative of the United States "sought clarification on the following points: (1) In dealing with matters of a highly technical nature, had it been the practice of the Council to establish working parties? (2) If one or several contracting parties asked for the establishment of a working party, was it in the tradition of GATT to grant such a request? The Chairman replied that it had been the practice of the Council to establish working parties when dealing with matters of a highly technical nature, as well as in some cases with matters of a more general nature. As for the establishment of a working party, he stated that this was closely linked to the issue of the terms of reference for that working party".⁹⁵

In the same Council meeting the representative of Australia, referring to paragraph 10 of the 1979 Understanding, "noted that ... the principle was clear: The CONTRACTING PARTIES would decide to establish a working party if this were requested by a contracting party. This view was supported by past GATT practice".⁹⁶ "The representative of India endorsed the Australian view and said that it would set a very bad precedent if the Council decided not to set up a working party when a serious request for doing so had been made. He stressed that this would have a particularly adverse impact for contracting parties not possessing retaliatory power". At its September 1981 meeting, the Council decided to establish a Working Party.⁹⁷

See also the discussion at the May 1988 Council meeting on the "right to a working party" in connection with the United States request for a working party on the relationship of internationally-recognized labour standards to international trade.⁹⁸

Paragraph 2(c) of the Decision of 8 December 1994 on "Avoidance of Procedural and Institutional Duplication" provides that "The Working Parties established under the GATT 1947 to examine a regional agreement or arrangement shall coordinate their activities with Working Parties of the WTO that examine the same regional agreement or arrangement." Footnote 1 to that paragraph provides that "The Working Parties of the WTO include Working Parties originating from decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT 1947 that were adopted before the entry into force of the WTO Agreement and therefore form part of the GATT 1994."⁹⁹ See page 1091 above.

2. Termination and reconvening of working parties

In the July 1981 Council discussion of the possibility of reconvening the working party under Article XVI on the possibility of limiting subsidization of sugar, in response to questions,

"The Chairman said that the existence of a working party was related to its terms of reference. In normal GATT practice, when a working party fulfilled its mandate, it ceased to exist when the Council adopted its report. However, when adopting a report, the Council could nevertheless decide to continue the existence of a working party with new or modified terms of reference. He recalled that, in the instance under discussion, the Director General had been invited to organize discussions in a working party and to submit a report to the Council within a stated time period, which had been accomplished. He said that while the Council might not be able to revive a defunct working party in the strictly legal sense, clearly it could decide to establish a new working party with similar or identical terms of reference. ...

"The Chairman said that it was up to the Council to decide what it meant by an earlier decision. Whereas nothing would prevent the Council from establishing a new working party to perform the same work, the Council could also interpret its earlier decision so as to continue the mandate of the old Working Party".¹⁰⁰

In November 1971 the Council agreed to the establishment of a Group on Environmental Measures and International Trade, “as standby machinery which would be ready to act only when and if the need arose ... whose main functions would be: 1. to examine upon request any specific matters relevant to the trade policy aspects of measures to control pollution and protect human environment especially with regard to the application of the provisions of the General Agreement taking into account the particular problems of developing countries; 2. to report to the Council”.¹⁰¹ In December 1990 it was proposed that the Group, which had not met hitherto, be convened during 1991.¹⁰² After debate in the Council and informal consultations, the Group was convened on the basis of a specific agenda to be adopted by it, and with a membership open to any contracting party which wished to participate.¹⁰³

F. PRINCIPAL STANDING BODIES ESTABLISHED IN THE GATT

At the Forty-fourth Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Chairman of the Council made the following suggestion regarding the appointment of presiding officers of standing bodies, in the form of a statement for the record.

“I suggest that in future, at the first Council meeting each year, on the basis of a consensus which would have emerged from consultations, the Council Chairman should propose the names of the presiding officers of the Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions, the Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration and the Committee on Tariff Concessions for the current year. This would not preclude the re-appointment of an incumbent.

“The Council Chairman would have formally announced beforehand, at a Council meeting or by means of a document, his intention to carry out consultations, open to all delegations, and he would have conducted them so as to ensure the transparency of the process.”

The CONTRACTING PARTIES took note of this suggestion.¹⁰⁴

Paragraph 2 of the Decision of 8 December 1994 on “Avoidance of Procedural and Institutional Duplication” provides that:

“(a) The following Committees established under the GATT 1947 or a Tokyo Round Agreement shall coordinate their activities with the corresponding Committees established under the WTO Agreement:

Committee on Trade and Development,
Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions,
Committee on Anti-Dumping Practices,
Committee on Customs Valuation,
Committee on Import Licensing,
Committee on Subsidies and Countervailing Measures,
Committee on Technical Barriers to Trade.

“(b) The Committee on Tariff Concessions and the Technical Group on Quantitative Restrictions and Other Non-Tariff Measures of the GATT 1947 shall coordinate their activities with the WTO Committee on Market Access proposed to be established. ...”¹⁰⁵

1. Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions

Establishment and terms of reference: Prior to 1958, consultations under the balance-of-payments articles of the General Agreement were conducted in a series of working parties established by the CONTRACTING PARTIES for that purpose. In 1958 the CONTRACTING PARTIES established the Committee, on the recommendation of the then Working Party on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions, with the following terms of reference:

“To conduct the consultations under Article XII:4(b) and Article XVIII:12(b) and any such consultations as may be initiated during the year under Article XII:4(a) or Article XVIII:12(a).”¹⁰⁶

Paragraph 4 of the 1979 Declaration on Trade Measures Taken for Balance-of-Payments Purposes provides that “all restrictive import measures taken for balance-of-payments purposes shall be subject to consultation in the GATT Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions”. Concerning the activities of the Committee, see the discussion of balance-of-payments consultations under Article XII. The Committee reports to the Council on each balance of payments consultation and each meeting.

On 31 January 1995, the WTO General Council established the WTO Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions and agreed on its terms of reference.¹⁰⁷

2. Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration

Prior to 1962, the GATT budget was examined by an ad hoc working party appointed each year by the CONTRACTING PARTIES for that purpose. In May 1962, this earlier practice was discontinued when the Council appointed a Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration, the terms of reference and operations of which are discussed below at page 1125.¹⁰⁸ The Committee and earlier working parties have examined the budget, the accounts and administration issues.¹⁰⁹

The members of the Committee are appointed by the Council. At the July 1991 meeting of the Council, in a discussion concerning the membership of the Budget Committee, one representative stated that “... while there were no formal arrangements for membership on the Committee, the tradition had been to keep it small and efficient. There had also been a tradition of rotation, such as between Belgium and the Netherlands; he was also aware that two other contracting parties were also consulting with a view to rotation. One should also perhaps recall that observers were welcome in the Committee, had access to its documents and were allowed full participation in its meetings”.¹¹⁰

The Committee reports to the Council on a periodic basis. On 31 January 1995 the WTO General Council established the WTO Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration and agreed on its terms of reference.¹¹¹ Concerning financial and budget procedures, and the operation of the Committee and the corresponding WTO Committee during the period of transitional co-existence of the GATT 1947 and the WTO, see at page 1125 and following.

3. Committee on Tariff Concessions

Pursuant to the GATT Work Program adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES at their Thirty-Fifth Session in November 1979, the Committee was established by the Council on 29 January 1980 with a mandate to “supervise the task of keeping the GATT schedules up to date; supervise the staging of tariff reductions; provide a forum for discussion of questions relating to tariffs; and to report periodically to the Council”.¹¹² The Committee reports annually to the Council. Further concerning the activities of the Committee, see the discussion

4. Consultative Group of Eighteen

The Consultative Group of Eighteen (CG-18) was established by Decision of the Council of 11 July 1975, initially as a temporary body.¹¹⁴ In the Group's report to the Council in 1979 it recommended that it should be established as a permanent body. Its mandate, as agreed by the Council on 22 November 1979, is as follows:

"The task of the Group is to facilitate the carrying out, by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, of their responsibilities, particularly with respect to:

- "(a) following international trade developments with a view to the pursuit and maintenance of trade policies consistent with the objectives and principles of the General Agreement;
- "(b) the forestalling, whenever possible, of sudden disturbances that could represent a threat to the multilateral trading system and to international trade relations generally; and action to deal with such disturbances if they in fact occur;
- "(c) the international adjustment process and the co-ordination, in this context, between the GATT and the IMF.

"In the pursuit of its task, the Group shall take into account the special characteristics and requirements of the economies of the developing countries and their problems.

"The Group shall not impinge upon the competence or authority of the CONTRACTING PARTIES or of the Council and shall not assume, or detract from, any of the decision-making responsibilities of these two bodies or of the permanent GATT Committees.

"The Group's membership shall be balanced and broadly representative, due regard being had to rotation of membership as appropriate. ... The Group shall submit once a year a comprehensive account of its activities to the Council".¹¹⁵

The 1979 Report of the CG-18 states that "It is strongly believed in the Group that the GATT should have at its disposal a small but representative group which would permit existing and emerging trade policy issues to be discussed in confidence among responsible officials from capitals and thus facilitate a concertation of policies in the trade field".¹¹⁶ The Director-General, as Chairman of the Group, has presented its reports, prepared on his own responsibility, to the Council. These reports have been reproduced in the BISD series. At the Forty-fifth Session in December 1989, the CONTRACTING PARTIES agreed to the Director-General's suggestion to the Council that the Group remain in suspense for 1990, with the understanding that if for any reason a meeting appeared to be desirable, he would convene it. Before doing so, he would request the Council to take the necessary decision on behalf of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on the composition of the Group.¹¹⁷ The Group did not meet in 1991 and 1992.

G. DOCUMENTATION

1. Document issuance and circulation

All GATT documents, with a few exceptions, are issued as “Restricted” documents. Documents issued as unrestricted documents include Decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, documents in the INF/ series and a few others. Restricted documents are issued by the Secretariat only to representatives of contracting parties and of those governments and international organizations which are invited to send observers to meetings of various GATT bodies.

In 1955, the Executive Secretary noted that a representative of a contracting party had called his attention to the necessity for using the reports of Review Session Working Parties in connection with legislative consideration of amendments to the General Agreement, and observed that “The classification ‘RESTRICTED’ should not, however, prevent a government from revealing to its appropriate legislative authorities any portion of a working party report which it considers necessary for the adequate understanding of the amendments. It is recognized that, where it is the practice to publish legislative hearings, this may result in the publication of certain parts of the Working Party reports before the normal date on which the complete document would be derestricted and become available for general public use. The Executive Secretary has so informed the contracting party concerned and invites other contracting parties to be guided by the same interpretation”.¹¹⁹

The Decision of 21 July 1993 on “Observer Status of Governments in the Council of Representatives” provides that “Observer governments shall have access to the main GATT document series”.¹²⁰

2. Derestriction procedures

Early Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provided, as a routine item of closing business, for derestriction after the end of the Session, of all session documents, including any other issued since the close of the previous Session, with a few exceptions such as the summary records of the current Session.¹²¹ Procedures for the derestriction of documents were adopted at the Fourth, Sixth, Fourteenth and Twenty-third Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.¹²² In 1967, a consolidation of the procedures in force was set out in L/2737, as follows:

- “1. Documents in the L/, COM.II/, COT/, BOP/ and C/ series (respectively: Limited Distribution, Committee II, Cotton and Textiles Committee, Committee on Balance-of-Payments Restrictions and Council) are derestricted sixty days after the close of each session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, and sixty days after any half-year in which no session is held. Decisions adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES during sessions or by postal ballots, are published in the L/ series as unrestricted documents.”¹²³
- “2. Documents in the COM.TD/ series (Committee on Trade and Development) are derestricted after each meeting of the Committee on Trade and Development, subject to a fifteen-day period after circulation of the list of documents proposed for derestriction.
- “3. Documents in the SR.../ series (summary records of sessions) are derestricted at the end of the second following session.
- “4. Documents in the C/M/ series (Minutes of the Council of Representatives) and selected documents in the SECRET/ series are derestricted at the end of each session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, with a delay of two years.

¹²¹GATT/CP.3/SR.42; derestriction agreed with the exception of documents originally classified as “secret”, documents of working parties (except those issued as numbered GATT documents), and documents for which any contracting party has requested that restricted status be continued; see also CP.3/76, CP.3/SR.41 p. 4.

¹²³At the Second Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES in 1948, “the Chairman proposed that the Secretariat should be authorized to issue the Decisions taken by the CONTRACTING PARTIES as unrestricted documents. The proposal was approved”. GATT/CP.2/SR.25 p. 5.

"The secretariat gives advance notice to contracting parties and intergovernmental organizations of the documents due for derestriction and fixes the date for the derestriction to take place. Any document, or any item in a summary record or Council minute, remains restricted at the request of a contracting party or an intergovernmental organization. A list of newly-derestricted documents is issued by the secretariat shortly after each date fixed for derestriction.

"All documents in series other than those mentioned in paragraphs 1 to 4 remain restricted, with the following exceptions:

"COM.I/, COM.III/, and AC/ series, now discontinued, have been derestricted. INF/ series and GATT press releases are not subject to restriction".

Document series which have come into existence since 1967 have been submitted to the CONTRACTING PARTIES for periodic derestriction, with some exceptions. The procedure in recent years has been for the Secretariat to propose a list of documents for derestriction twice a year, allowing governments and intergovernmental organizations sixty days to request that a document or portion thereof remain restricted. Occasionally documents have been derestricted outside of these twice-yearly exercises at a contracting party's request, subject to the same 60-day requirement,¹²⁴ or immediately upon decision at a Council meeting.¹²⁵ Decisions on derestriction or derestriction practices have also been made with respect to types of documents, document series or a specific document.¹²⁶ A list of documents recently derestricted and those remaining restricted is issued twice a year in the INF/ series.

A series of consultations on document derestriction were conducted in the GATT Council in 1993-94. At the Fiftieth Session in December 1994, the Chairman noted that delegations had been unable to reach consensus before the last meeting of the Council in 1994, as some were interested primarily in the treatment of documents to be issued in the future under the auspices of the WTO, while others thought that any change in procedures should not apply to past GATT documents, given expectations of confidentiality when those documents were issued. A number of delegations had therefore proposed that informal consultations be held to establish procedures for issuance and derestriction of WTO documents; in the light of such consultations procedures for issuance and derestriction of GATT 1947 documentation could then be reviewed.¹²⁷

3. Panel reports and the roster of non-governmental panelists

At its meeting on 4 May 1988, "the Council agreed that in future, panel reports would be derestricted upon their adoption by the Council or the CONTRACTING PARTIES unless, prior to adoption, a party to the dispute had informed the Council Chairman or CONTRACTING PARTIES' Chairman that it opposed derestriction in that particular case. The Secretariat would check with the parties to a dispute prior to the Council meeting or CONTRACTING PARTIES' Session in this connection".¹²⁸ At its meeting on 21 June 1994, the Council agreed that the roster of non-governmental panelists would be issued henceforth as an unrestricted document in the L/ series.¹²⁹

4. Documents associated with negotiating rounds

Eight negotiating rounds have been conducted in the GATT: 1947 (Geneva), 1949 (Annecy), 1950 (Torquay), 1956 (Geneva), 1960-61 (Dillon Round), 1962-67 (Kennedy Round), 1974-79 (Tokyo Round) and the Uruguay Round. Essentially all documents relating to these rounds remain restricted. Uruguay Round documentation, too, has been issued in restricted document series; on 30 March 1994, the Uruguay Round Trade Negotiations Committee decided on derestriction procedures for Uruguay Round documents.¹³⁰

5. Documents of bodies established under separate agreements

When the Committees administering the Tokyo Round Agreements were first convened in early 1980 and 1981, each of those bodies decided that working documents and minutes would never be derestricted and that the secretariat should make a proposal annually regarding other documents to be derestricted at the end of the year and that these documents would be derestricted if no delegation objected to the proposal.¹³¹ Under these procedures, the bodies mentioned thereunder propose a list of documents for derestriction annually. On occasion a document has also been derestricted by a decision of the body issuing it.¹³² Certain other bodies of limited membership have also established their own document derestriction policies.¹³³

IV. INSTITUTIONAL ISSUES IN TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Trade negotiations in the GATT have generally been conducted under the supervision of a Trade Negotiations Committee (earlier, a Tariff Negotiations Committee). The General Agreement does not require individual contracting parties to participate in GATT-sponsored negotiations. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may invite non-contracting parties to participate. Almost all past rounds of negotiations have also provided the opportunity for negotiations on accession by one or more governments. See under Article XXVIII bis above; see also the 1985 Secretariat Note on the "Launching and Organization of Trade Negotiations in the GATT"¹³⁴ and Secretariat Notes on negotiating procedures in the Dillon, Kennedy and Tokyo Rounds.¹³⁵

The Uruguay Round was launched by a conference of Ministers meeting on the occasion of the Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES at Punta del Este, Uruguay. The Ministerial Declaration of 20 September 1986 on the Uruguay Round established a Trade Negotiations Committee to carry out the negotiations, and provided in two parts for the launching of negotiations on trade in goods and in services, respectively, conducted within a Group for Negotiations on Goods and a Group for Negotiations on Services each reporting to the Trade Negotiations Committee.

As for participation, the Ministerial Declaration provided that the negotiations would be open to: (i) all contracting parties; (ii) countries having acceded provisionally; (iii) countries applying the GATT on a de facto basis having announced, not later than 30 April 1987, their intention to accede to the GATT and to participate in the negotiations; (iv) countries that had already informed the CONTRACTING PARTIES, at a regular meeting of the Council of Representatives, of their intention to negotiate the terms of their membership as a contracting party; and (v) developing countries that had, by 30 April 1987, initiated procedures for accession to the GATT with the intention of negotiating the terms of their accession during the course of the negotiations. Participation in negotiations relating to the amendment or application of GATT provisions or the negotiation of new provisions would be open only to contracting parties.¹³⁶ On 5 July 1993, the TNC agreed that by analogy, and mutatis mutandis, the Decision referred to above on page 1094 regarding the contracting party status of Yugoslavia would apply to the Uruguay Round and to the Trade Negotiations Committee.¹³⁷ As of the 15 April 1994 Marrakesh Ministerial Meeting concluding the Uruguay Round, there were 125 countries and territories participants in the Round.¹³⁸ On 28 July 1993, the TNC further agreed that the countries and territories which are negotiating accession to GATT but are not presently participating in the Uruguay Round, may, upon request, be associated with the activities of the Uruguay Round; these countries and territories would be invited to be present, without participating in the deliberations, at formal meetings of Uruguay Round bodies, would have access to minutes of meetings where they were present, but would not be entitled to table offers or other documentation for circulation to participants. As of 15 April 1994 there were 19 such countries or territories.¹³⁹

V. THE INTERIM COMMISSION FOR THE INTERNATIONAL TRADE ORGANIZATION (ICITO)

1. Establishment and membership

The Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization (ICITO) was established by a Resolution of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment (the Havana Conference) "considering that pending the establishment of the Organization certain interim functions should be performed".¹⁴⁰ The Annex to this Resolution provides for the membership and functions of ICITO and provides in paragraph 9 that "The Commission shall cease to exist upon the appointment of the Director-General of the Organization, at which time the property and records of the Commission shall be transferred to the Organization".

The Havana Conference Resolution Establishing an Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization provides that the Commission shall consist of "the governments the representatives of which have approved this resolution and which are entitled to original membership of the Organization under Article 71 of the [ITO] Charter". The fifty-two delegations which approved the resolution are listed in the note below.¹⁴¹ Under Article 71 of the Charter the governments which were entitled to original membership were those States and customs territories invited to the United Nations Conference for Trade and Employment in Havana.

The Interim Commission itself has met only once, on 20 March 1948 during the Havana Conference. The Annex to the Havana Conference Resolution provides that "the Commission shall elect an Executive Committee of eighteen members to exercise any or all of its functions as the Commission may determine on electing the Committee". At its first meeting, the Commission elected its Executive Committee consisting of: Australia, Benelux Union, Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Greece, India, Italy, Mexico, Norway, Philippines, United Kingdom and United States.¹⁴² The Executive Committee membership has not changed since that election except for the deletion of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic when it ceased to exist on 31 December 1992; seventeen members remain.

¹³⁸ MTN.TNC/MIN(94)/INF/1 (list of participants). Participants as of 15 April 1994 were: Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Argentina, Australia, Austria, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Barbados, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Botswana, Brazil, Brunei Darussalam, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cameroon, Canada, Central African Rep, Chad, Chile, China, Colombia, Congo, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, European , Communities, Fiji, Finland, France, Gabon, Gambia, Germany, Ghana, Greece, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Honduras, Hong Kong, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Kenya, Republic of Korea, Kuwait, Lesotho, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Macau, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Maldives, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Mozambique, Myanmar, Namibia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Niger, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Qatar, Romania, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Slovak Republic, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Suriname, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland, Tanzania, Thailand, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Tunisia, Turkey, Uganda, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Zaire, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

E/CONF.2/78 or ICITO/I/4, p. 69.

¹⁴² "It was agreed that the election of the Executive Committee should proceed along the lines of Article [78 of the Charter] and the Annex thereto". ICITO/1/SR.1 p. 1.

The Executive Committee met on 20 March 1948 at the Havana Conference, then at Geneva from 25 August to 15 September 1948 during the Second Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, and in the summer of 1949 during the Third Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. A third session was scheduled for September 1949, on which date the Charter provided that (if the Charter had not entered into force) the Secretary-General of the United Nations would invite those governments which had deposited instruments of acceptance of the Charter to enter into consultation to determine whether and on what conditions they desired to bring the Charter into force.¹⁴³ In view of the delay in receiving acceptances of the Havana Charter¹⁴⁴, in August 1949 the Executive Committee agreed to postpone this meeting until a date when the entry into force of the Charter and the holding of the first ITO Conference were more imminent.¹⁴⁵ On 6 December 1950 the United States Department of State issued a statement of policy indicating that the Havana Charter would not be submitted again to the United States Congress. It subsequently became evident that the establishment of the ITO would be indefinitely postponed.¹⁴⁶

Since 1950, the Executive Committee of ICITO has met only four times. The meetings on 29 March 1968, 4 August 1980, and 10 June 1993 were held to replace the Executive Secretary and confirm the appointment of the GATT Director-General designate as his successor.¹⁴⁷ For instance, at the June 1993 meeting it was agreed that the appointment of Mr. Peter Sutherland as Executive Secretary of ICITO would be coterminous with his tenure as Director-General to the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT. The final meeting of the Executive Committee, held on 9 December 1995, adopted the Transfer Agreement reprinted in extenso at page 1123.

2. Functions

Paragraph 2 of the Annex to the Havana Conference Resolution provided that the Commission was to have the following functions, which bore on preparation for the first Conference of the ITO:

- “(a) to convoke the first regular session of the Conference of the Organization (hereinafter referred to as “the Conference”) not less than four months and, as far as practicable, not more than six months after the receipt of the last acceptance needed to bring the Charter into force;
- “(b) to submit the provisional agenda for the first regular session of the Conference, together with documents and recommendations relating to all matters upon this agenda, including (i) proposals as to the programme and budget for the first year of the Organization;¹⁴⁸ (ii) studies regarding selection of headquarters of the Organization;¹⁴⁹ (iii) draft financial and staff regulations.¹⁵⁰
- “(c) to prepare, in consultation with the United Nations, a draft agreement of relationship as contemplated in paragraph 1 of Article 86 of the Charter¹⁵¹ for consideration by the first regular session of the Conference;

¹⁴³Havana Charter, Article 103:2(b). This date is also referred to in Article XXIX:3 of the General Agreement: see the chapter on Article XXIX.

¹⁴⁴A Secretariat Note on “Interim Arrangements and Postponement of ITO” (Sec/36/53 (mid-1953)) states that “By the end of 1950 the Havana Charter had been accepted by Liberia and - conditional upon acceptance by the United Kingdom and the United States - by Australia. The Swedish Riksdag authorized Sweden’s adherence at the discretion of the Foreign Minister. No acceptances had been deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations”.

¹⁵⁵This paragraph provides that “The authentic text of the Charter in the Chinese, Russian and Spanish languages will be established by the Interim Commission of the International Trade Organization, in accordance with the procedure established by the Conference”. See ICITO/EC.2/5, ICITO/EC.2/15. Texts of the Charter in these languages are on deposit in the GATT Library. An authentic Spanish language text of the Charter was finalized by the ICITO Executive Committee; see the material on authentic texts under Article XXVI in this book.

¹⁵⁶In this Resolution, the Conference “Resolves that the Interim Commission on the International Trade Organization, through such means as may be appropriate, shall consult with appropriate officials of the International Court or with the Court itself, and after such consultation report to the first regular session of the Conference of the [ITO] upon the questions of: (a) whether [the procedures in Chapter VIII of the Charter for review of legal questions arising out of decisions and recommendations of the Organization] need to be changed to ensure that decisions of the Court on matters referred to it by the Organization should, with respect to the Organization, have the nature of a judgment; and (b) whether an amendment should be presented to the Conference pursuant to and in accordance with the provisions of [Annex N of the Charter]”. E/CONF.2/78 or ICITO/I/4, p. 71. On ICITO implementation of this mandate see ICITO/EC.2/3, ICITO/EC.2/15, ICITO/EC.2/SR.3 p. 3-6, ICITO/EC.2/SR.11 p. 1-9, ICITO/EC.2/SR.12 p. 1-2.

¹⁵⁷This Resolution directed the ICITO “to examine (i) the powers, responsibilities and activities in the field of industrial and general economic development and reconstruction of the United Nations, of the specialized agencies and of other inter-governmental organizations, including regional organizations; (ii) the availability of facilities for technical surveys or studies of: the natural resources of under-developed countries; or the possibilities of their industrial development, whether general or in relation to the processing of locally produced raw materials or other particular industries; or for the improvement of their systems of transportation and communications; or with respect to the manner in which investment of foreign capital may contribute to their economic development; and in the light of this examination to report to the Organization upon (a) the structure and administrative methods, (b) the working relations with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other inter-governmental organizations including regional organizations[,] which will enable the [ITO] most effectively to carry out its positive functions for the promotion of the economic development and reconstruction of Members”. E/CONF.2/78 or ICITO/I/4 p. 74. On implementation see ICITO/EC.2/7 and annexes, ICITO/EC.2/20, ICITO/EC.2/SR.3 p. 6-11, ICITO/EC.2/SR.15 p. 7, ICITO/EC.2/SR.16.

¹⁵⁸The Sub-Committee in question was unable to accept a Swiss proposal (E/CONF.2/C.3/11, Havana Reports p. 102) but recommended that ICITO “invite the Swiss Government to participate in a study of the problems facing the Swiss economy with a view to submitting to the first Conference of the Organization a report as to the measures for dealing with the Swiss problem which could be taken in accordance with the procedures established in the Charter”. Havana Reports, p. 44-45; see also ibid. p. 102-105. On implementation see ICITO/EC.2/9, ICITO/EC.2/18, ICITO/EC.2/SR.4 p. 1-5, ICITO/EC.2/SR.15 p. 1-2.

¹⁵⁹Concerning the consultations see ICITO/EC.1/SR.2 p. 2, ICITO/EC.2/4, ICITO/EC.2/14/Add.1, ICITO/EC.2/SR.9 p. 1-11, ICITO/EC.2/SR.14 p. 1-4.

The Sixth Committee of the Havana Conference “agreed that the performance of the functions specified in subparagraphs 2(c), (d) and (e) of the Annex to the Havana Conference Resolution could not result in the increase of the obligations or the decrease of the rights of Members under the Charter”.¹⁶⁰

At the first and only meeting of the Interim Commission itself, it was agreed that the Commission should delegate all its powers to the Executive Committee including the power to replace the Executive Secretary if this should become necessary.¹⁶¹ No later meetings of the Interim Commission were held.

A 1953 Secretariat Note states: “The main task of the Interim Commission was to prepare the ground for the first session of ITO, including a plan of work for the first year of the Organization, the budget, the site for ITO headquarters, relations with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other inter- and non-governmental organizations. The bulk of this task - so far as events could be foreseen - was completed in 1949, and since that time the secretariat of the ICITO has been almost entirely occupied with the performance of duties for the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade”.¹⁶²

3. Procedures

Rules of Procedure were adopted at the Interim Commission’s first meeting and revised at the second session of the Executive Committee.¹⁶³ The Chairman of the Executive Committee was elected at each meeting thereof.

4. Budget

In the course of arrangements for certain administrative services to be performed on a reimbursement basis by the Secretariat of the United Nations during the early years of the GATT, the Executive Secretary of ICITO agreed “that the administration, financial and personnel regulations of the United Nations shall, where appropriate, apply to the Secretariat of the Interim Commission”.¹⁶⁴

The ICITO budget in 1948-50 was financed by contributions from the CONTRACTING PARTIES and by advances from the Working Capital Fund of the United Nations. In 1953 ICITO was paid by the CONTRACTING PARTIES for services rendered prior to 1951 and repaid the same amount to the United Nations, liquidating its outstanding balance. A Note to this effect from the Executive Secretary of 5 October 1954 also stated that “As all current expenditure of ICITO is automatically repaid by the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, all financial operations of ICITO are now self-liquidating and it therefore appears unnecessary to issue any further statement on the accounts or the financial position of the ICITO”.¹⁶⁵

5. Secretariat

The Havana Conference Resolution provides that “the Commission shall elect an Executive Secretary who shall be its chief administrative officer. The Executive Secretary shall appoint the staff of the Commission observing, as far as possible, the principles of paragraph 2 of Article 85 of the Charter ... The Executive Secretary shall also perform such other functions and duties as the Commission shall determine”. Paragraph 2 of Article 85 of the Charter provides: “The selection of the members of the staff, including the appointment of the Deputy Directors-General, shall as far as possible be made on a wide geographical basis and with due regard to the various types of economy represented by Member countries. The paramount consideration in the selection of candidates and in determining the conditions of service of the staff shall be the necessity of securing the highest standards of efficiency, competence, impartiality and integrity”.

¹⁶⁵ICITO/1/35.

The preparatory work of the Charter states that “It was agreed that under the second sentence of paragraph 3 of the annex to the resolution the Executive Secretary of the Commission might ... be authorized to make available to the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade acting jointly in accordance with Article XXV thereof, at their request, the services of the staff upon terms to be agreed”.¹⁶⁶ The CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted at their Second Session in September 1948 a Resolution requesting ICITO to furnish secretariat services to them. The Executive Committee of ICITO met at that time and approved financial arrangements which conferred authority on the Executive Secretary of ICITO to provide secretariat services to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. It was also agreed that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would reimburse ICITO for the services so rendered.¹⁶⁷ The second Report on Continuing Administration of the General Agreement adopted 24 October 1951 recommended “that the CONTRACTING PARTIES decide that the usual functions of a secretariat continue to be carried out, pending further consideration at a later session, by the Executive Secretary of the Interim Commission for an International Trade Organization”.¹⁶⁸

This arrangement between ICITO and the CONTRACTING PARTIES has continued to the present day. As from 1 January 1951, the ICITO Secretariat has worked exclusively for the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the CONTRACTING PARTIES have borne the entire cost of the ICITO Secretariat.¹⁶⁹ The Chairman of the Executive Committee of ICITO stated at its most recent meeting that “From a legal point of view, it was therefore the Executive Secretary of ICITO who provided secretariat services to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. Although in the course of over forty years of practical developments this subtle legal distinction had virtually been ignored, it was imperative that the function of Director-General to the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the GATT and that of Executive Secretary of ICITO be exercised by the same person, so as to enable the secretariat to engage in contractual transactions, and to participate in the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund”.¹⁷⁰

In 1955 the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a decision enabling ICITO staff to participate in the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund.¹⁷¹ The regulations of the Pension Fund were amended by a United Nations General Assembly Resolution to permit the admission of ICITO staff,¹⁷² an agreement was concluded between the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Executive Secretary of ICITO on 20 May 1957, and the staff of ICITO were admitted to the UNJSPF as from 1 July 1957. ICITO staff disputes regarding non-pension fund matters are submitted to the IBO Administrative Tribunal and disputes regarding pension matters are submitted to the UN Administrative Tribunal.

6. Termination of ICITO and transfer of ICITO and GATT assets, liabilities, records, staff and functions to the WTO

The CONTRACTING PARTIES at their Sixth Special Session on 8 December 1994 and the Executive Committee of ICITO at its final meeting on 9 December 1994 each approved a Decision on “Transitional Arrangements: Transfer Agreement between GATT 1947, ICITO and the WTO”.¹⁷³ The Decision was also agreed to by the Preparatory Committee for the WTO, and was endorsed by the General Council of the WTO at its first meeting on 31 January 1995.¹⁷⁴ The “Agreement on the Transfer of Assets, Liabilities, Records, Staff and Functions from the Interim Commission of the International Trade Organization and the GATT to the World Trade Organization”, attached to this Decision, provides as follows:

“The CONTRACTING PARTIES to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (hereinafter referred to as the ‘GATT 1947’), the Executive Committee of the Interim Commission of the International Trade Organization ... and the Preparatory Committee for the World Trade Organization ...

“Noting that:

“Articles VI:1 and XVI:2 of the Marrakesh Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization ... provide that there shall be a Secretariat of the WTO and that, to the extent practicable, the Secretariat of the GATT 1947 shall become the Secretariat of the WTO;

“the duties of the Secretariat of the GATT 1947 are presently being performed by the staff of the ICITO;

“the Director-General of the WTO, according to Article VI:3 of the WTO Agreement, will be able to appoint the members of the staff of the WTO Secretariat only after the Ministerial Conference or General Council of the WTO has adopted regulations governing the duties and conditions of service of the staff;

“Recalling that paragraph 8 (a) of the Ministerial Decision on the Establishment of the Preparatory Committee adopted on 14 April 1994 authorizes the Preparatory Committee to take, as appropriate, decisions in advance of the establishment of the WTO, inter alia, on financial regulations, the budget estimates for the first year of operation of the WTO, the transfer of the property of the ICITO and the GATT 1947 to the WTO, and the terms and conditions of the transfer of ICITO staff to the Secretariat of the WTO;

“Agree as follows:

“1. As from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement, all assets and liabilities of the GATT 1947 and the ICITO shall be assets and liabilities of the WTO. The assets and liabilities of the GATT 1947 and the ICITO shall include the assets held and the liabilities incurred in the name of ICITO/GATT.

“2. The Director-General of the WTO, acting in accordance with the provisions of Articles VI:3 and XVI:2 of the WTO Agreement, shall appoint the members of the staff of the Secretariat of the WTO on or before 30 June 1995, provided that the General Council of the WTO has adopted prior to that date regulations governing the duties and conditions of service of the members of the staff of the WTO Secretariat, including regulations on contract of employment policy, salaries and pensions.

“3. The staff of the ICITO shall perform the duties of the Secretariat of the WTO until the appointment of the staff of the Secretariat of the WTO. The staff of the ICITO shall continue to perform the duties of the GATT 1947 Secretariat and those of the Secretariat of the bodies established under the Tokyo Round Agreements until the appointment of the staff of the Secretariat of the WTO; thereafter these duties shall be performed by the Secretariat of the WTO.

“4. The ICITO is herewith dissolved as of the date on which the members of the Secretariat of the WTO are appointed. On that date the records of the ICITO shall be transferred to the WTO.

“5. The Director-General of the WTO shall perform the depositary functions of the Director-General of the GATT 1947 after the date on which the legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are terminated. On that date the records of the GATT 1947 shall be transferred to the WTO.

“6. There shall be a common budget for the GATT 1947 and the WTO from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement until the date as of which the legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are terminated. During that period the basis for assessment of the contracting parties to the GATT 1947, of the Members of the WTO and of contracting parties that are also Members of the WTO shall be the same, and a single payment to the WTO shall be due by all contracting parties to the GATT 1947 and Members of the WTO.

“7. The Director-General of the GATT 1947 and, after the date of the entry into force of the WTO Agreement, the Director-General of the WTO are herewith authorized to take, in consultation with the Committees on Budget, Finance and Administration of the GATT 1947 and the WTO, the necessary actions to adjust the contractual arrangements of the ICITO and of the GATT 1947, including the arrangements on financial and personnel matters, to the changes provided for under paragraphs 1 to 6 above.

“8. This Agreement shall initially apply until the date of the first meeting of the General Council of the WTO. It shall remain in force beyond that date provided that it is approved by the General Council of the WTO.

“9. The text of this Agreement, done in a single copy, in the English, French and Spanish languages, each text being authentic, shall be deposited with the Director-General of the GATT 1947.”

VI. BUDGET

A. FINANCIAL AND BUDGET PROCEDURES

Rule 15 of the Rules of Procedure of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provides that “The usual duties of a secretariat shall, by agreement with the Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization, be performed by the Executive Secretary of the Interim Commission on a reimbursable basis”. The services performed by the Secretariat of the ICITO have been therefore reimbursed from the budget of the CONTRACTING PARTIES. See the material directly above on the budget, financial procedures and Secretariat of ICITO.

Prior to 1962, the GATT budget was examined by an ad hoc working party appointed each year by the CONTRACTING PARTIES for that purpose. In May 1962, this earlier practice was discontinued when the Council appointed a Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration of fourteen members.¹⁷⁵ The current terms of reference of the Budget Committee are as follows:

- (i) “To examine any questions arising in connection with the audited accounts, proposals for the budgets of the GATT and of the International Trade Centre UNCTAD/GATT, and the financing thereof.
- (ii) “To study any financial and administrative questions which may be referred to it by the Council or submitted to it by the Director-General, and undertake such other studies as may be assigned to it by the Council”.¹⁷⁶

The Budget Committee makes recommendations to the CONTRACTING PARTIES through the Council regarding adoption of the draft budget, and the CONTRACTING PARTIES then take a decision on the budget according to the usual procedures. With regard to the accounts of the GATT, the Committee examines reports submitted to it by the Director-General and the External Auditor. The Committee submits annually to the CONTRACTING PARTIES, through the Council, its recommendation regarding approval of the audited accounts for the past fiscal year. The Council has exceptionally and for emergency reasons taken decisions on recommendations of the Budget Committee.¹⁷⁷ The Committee has on occasion made recommendations on administrative matters.

Paragraph 6 of the Agreement on the Transfer of Assets, Liabilities, Records, Staff and Functions from ICITO and GATT to the WTO, cited in extenso in the preceding section, provides that “There shall be a common budget for the GATT 1947 and the WTO from the date of entry into force of the WTO Agreement until the date as of which the legal instruments through which the contracting parties apply the GATT 1947 are terminated. During that period the basis for assessment of the contracting parties to the GATT 1947, of the Members of the WTO and of contracting parties that are also Members of the WTO shall be the same, and a single payment to the WTO shall be due by all contracting parties to the GATT 1947 and Members of the WTO.” At their Fiftieth Session on 9 December 1994, the Contracting Parties decided as following concerning the future treatment of the budget of the GATT 1947:

“... given that:

“– the WTO Secretariat will service all agreements, through a single budget;

¹⁷⁵C/M/10, p.15. In 1963 and 1964, the Council appointed a Budget Committee based on a proposal by the Council Chairman, and in 1965 through 1967 the Council agreed on composition, chairmanship and terms of reference of the Budget Committee.

¹⁷⁶L/5964/Rev.5.

¹⁷⁷C/M/251 p. 17-19, July 1991, adopting Budget Committee report in L/6870.

- “– there is to be a common assessment system with a single payment from each Member or GATT 1947 contracting party;
- “– there are practical problems for some participants in achieving ratification of the WTO by 1 January 1995;
- “– the Final Act will remain open for acceptance for a period of two years following its entry into force;
- “– that at different times during this period of two years some participants will change their status in respect of the WTO and GATT 1947;
- “... during the period in which the Final Act is open for acceptance:
- “– the WTO Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration and the GATT 1947 Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration will meet in joint session with the same Chairman and a common agenda;
- “– members of both the GATT 1947 Committee and the WTO Committee may participate fully on all agenda items;
- “– until agreed otherwise, it shall be understood that matters relating to the ITC are dealt with on the understanding that they do not preempt the final position of the WTO in respect of the ITC;
- “– this arrangement shall be reconsidered before the end of the period during which the Final Act is open for acceptance.”¹⁷⁸

B. RESOURCES

Since the adoption of the first contribution scale at the Second Session in September 1948, contributions of the contracting parties to the GATT budget for the year to come have been allocated on the basis of the volume of foreign trade in that year, estimated on the basis of a representative period.¹⁷⁹ A Working Party at the Third Session stated the view that “the best practical method would be to assess the contributions on the basis of the volume of the foreign trade of the Contracting Parties. This criterion was a simple one and was considered to be appropriate in the case of a group which is concerned with foreign trade”.¹⁸⁰

A footnote to the scale of contributions included in the 1992 report of the Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration states that “The contribution of each contracting party and associated government is calculated on the basis of its share in the total trade of the contracting parties and associated governments. The shares of the contracting parties in the total trade are computed on the basis of foreign trade figures for the last three available years. The scale of contributions also includes a minimum percentage contribution of 0.03 per cent for countries whose trade value is 0.03 per cent or less of the total trade of the contracting parties and associated governments”.¹⁸¹ The present minimum budget contribution percentage was decided in 1988.¹⁸² The level of the minimum contribution has been set at 31,320 Swiss francs for 1994.¹⁸³

¹⁷⁹GATT/CP.2/41, adopted CP.2/SR.24 p. 8-9; shares at that time were based on the figures in Annex H of GATT, which reflected total external trade based on the average of 1938 and the latest twelve months for which figures were available (see I/67).

¹⁸⁰GATT/CP.3/WP.9 Budget/4/Rev.1, 3 August 1949.

¹⁸¹L/7105, adopted on 3 December 1992, BISD 39S/8. Closely similar statements appear in every budget report since L/596 (1957). Budget shares have been adjusted when the territory of a contracting party has diminished or enlarged. See GATT/CP.4/9/Add.2 (adjustment to contribution of Netherlands following accession of Indonesia under Article XXVI), L/3793 (adjustment to contribution of Pakistan following independence of Bangladesh), L/5986 (adjustment to contribution of United Kingdom following accession of Hong Kong as a contracting party), L/7455 (prospective adjustment to contribution of Switzerland after 1994 succession of Liechtenstein to separate contracting party status, since former Swiss had been based on statistics including those of Liechtenstein). However, see reservation of Germany regarding calculation of its budget share after reunification, C/M/251 p. 18, L/7105.

¹⁸²See recommendations in the 12 September 1988 Report of the Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration, L/6384.

¹⁸³Report of the Committee on Budget, Finance and Administration, PC/6, L/7577, adopted by the CONTRACTING PARTIES on 9 December 1994.

During discussion of the budget at the October 1988 Council meeting, the representative of the United Kingdom stated that "GATT was unusual among international institutions in that its subject matter, trade, could be used as a basis for providing a formula for its own funding. Adoption of this new budgetary package reconfirmed contracting parties' commitment to the principle of payment according to trade share ... The maintenance of a minimum contribution in no way undermined the principle in GATT of payment according to trade share. Any contracting party, by its very membership of and participation in the organization, entailed certain basic financial costs. Having a minimum contribution merely reflected that fact".¹⁸⁴

Since 1956 the GATT has maintained a Working Capital Fund, constituted of advances made by contracting parties, which are carried to the credit of the contracting parties which have made them; and other sums as decided by the CONTRACTING PARTIES, which are credited to the organization.¹⁸⁵ A government acceding to the General Agreement is required to make an advance to the Working Capital Fund in accordance with the scale of contributions applicable to the budget in the year of its accession. The minimum advance to the Working Capital Fund amounts to 0.5 per cent of the principal of the Fund for countries whose share of the total trade of the contracting parties and associated governments is 0.5 per cent or less.¹⁸⁶

At their Second Special Session in 1964, the CONTRACTING PARTIES adopted a recommendation of the Council "that in all cases where governments are in arrears for two years, the Executive Secretary, on behalf of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, should inform such governments of the CONTRACTING PARTIES' concern that such a situation exists and invited them to inform the CONTRACTING PARTIES through him of the steps they intend to take to fulfil their financial obligations. The Executive Secretary should communicate to the Council and/or the CONTRACTING PARTIES the replies received".¹⁸⁷ See also the discussion of arrears at the Council meetings of October 1987¹⁸⁸, October 1988¹⁸⁹ and June 1994.¹⁹⁰ At the Fiftieth Session in December 1994 the CONTRACTING PARTIES approved administrative measures to be applied to contracting parties which since 1989 had accumulated more than three years arrears in the payment of their contributions.¹⁹¹

In October 1993 the Council adopted a Budget Committee recommendation that as from 1 January 1994 observer governments be invited to contribute, for services provided to them, 50 per cent of the minimum contribution applying to contracting parties. Administrative measures would be applied to observers which do not pay.¹⁹² In December 1994 at the Fiftieth Session the CONTRACTING PARTIES approved a Decision on "Financial obligations of states or separate customs territories that are observers to the WTO", under which the specified contribution is not voluntary but mandatory; however, the preface to that Decision provides that "These financial obligations will not apply to the States or separate customs territories which are GATT 1947 contracting parties, in the process of ratification of the WTO Agreement, but have not yet become Members."¹⁹³ See also at page 1104 above.

VII. SECRETARIAT

Rule 15 of the Rules of Procedure of the CONTRACTING PARTIES provides that "The usual duties of a secretariat shall, by agreement with the Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization, be performed by the Executive Secretary of the Interim Commission on a reimbursable basis". As from 1 January

¹⁸⁵The Working Capital Fund was created by the Resolution on the Budget for 1956 (L/596) and replaced a Cash Reserve set up on 27 November 1950 (GATT/CP.5/10, GATT/CP.5/13, GATT/CP/84, discussion at GATT/CP.5/SR.3). The rules governing the use of the Fund were modified by Decisions in 1958, 1960, 1965, and 1967; see Spec(65)82, and L/5009, Secretariat Note on "Working Capital Fund" dated 30 July 1980 (including text of rules governing the Fund).

1951, the ICITO Secretariat has worked exclusively for the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the CONTRACTING PARTIES have borne the entire cost of the ICITO Secretariat.¹⁹⁴

The multilateral trade agreements reached in the Tokyo Round generally provide that they will be serviced by the GATT Secretariat.¹⁹⁵

Article XVI:1 of the WTO Agreement provides that "To the extent practicable, the Secretariat of GATT 1947 shall become the Secretariat of the WTO ...". See also above at page 1123 concerning the transfer agreement between the CONTRACTING PARTIES to GATT 1947, ICITO and the WTO.

A. DIRECTOR-GENERAL (EXECUTIVE SECRETARY)

The Director-General to the CONTRACTING PARTIES to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade serves simultaneously as the Executive Secretary of the Interim Commission. Before 1965, the Director-General was referred to as the "Executive Secretary". The CONTRACTING PARTIES decided on 23 March 1965 that

"... whenever the words "Executive Secretary" have been heretofore used in any decision, document or action taken or issued by virtue of the authority of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, such words shall hereafter be deemed to read "Director-General" and shall mean Director-General to the CONTRACTING PARTIES. ... The Director-General shall have all the duties, powers, privileges and responsibilities heretofore granted the Executive Secretary by the CONTRACTING PARTIES or by virtue of the authority of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, including but not limited to the functions of the Executive Secretary as Depositary Agent under all protocols and other instruments of the CONTRACTING PARTIES".¹⁹⁶

The same decision provided that where this change would have required a protocol of amendment or action other than a decision of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, such duties or powers, including but not limited to those conferred upon the Executive Secretary by the General Agreement, shall be exercised by the person holding the position of Director-General, who shall for this purpose also hold the position of Executive Secretary.

The CONTRACTING PARTIES on 26 November 1986 approved a report by their Chairman to the effect that consultations with contracting parties had resulted in consensus on the following statement:

"The Director-General should be appointed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES at a regular Session for a term of office of four years. The CONTRACTING PARTIES may reappoint the Director-General for a further term not exceeding four years. The decision to appoint the Director-General for a first term should be taken after a process of consultation to be conducted by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES and to be started by an announcement at the Council of Representatives not less than six months before the Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES where the appointment is made.

"Consultations about the reappointment of the Director-General should be conducted by the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES after an announcement has been made at a meeting of the Council of Representatives, not less than six months before the termination of the first term of office of the Director-General.

"In the event of a vacancy during the term of office of the Director-General, the Chairman of the CONTRACTING PARTIES should conduct as rapidly as possible consultations on the appointment of a new Director-General. The new Director-General should be appointed by the CONTRACTING PARTIES within six months from the date of the vacancy, if necessary at a special Session convened for the purpose. The Council of Representatives will designate one of the Deputy Directors-General as Acting Director-General until the appointment of a new Director-General".¹⁹⁷

¹⁹⁵A provision to this effect appears in the final provisions or institutional provisions of each of these agreements.

¹⁹⁷L/6099, approved on 26 November 1986, 33S/55-56.

The report also notes that "I wish to underline that I am reporting on the results of my consultations in the form of a statement. This means that there will be a reasonable amount of flexibility in the future application of the procedures forming part of this statement".¹⁹⁸ At the Fifth Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, convened on 9 June 1993 to appoint the new Director-General, the Chairman noted that in view of the particular circumstances it had not been possible to follow this statement in every detail; that the deviations were in the nature of the "flexible application" cited in the 1986 report; and that the 1986 procedures would remain unchanged for future use, until they were modified. The appointment of Mr. Peter Sutherland as Director-General was then approved by acclamation.¹⁹⁹

Article XVI:2 of the WTO Agreement provides that "... the Director-General to the CONTRACTING PARTIES to GATT 1947, until such time as the Ministerial Conference has appointed a Director-General in accordance with paragraph 2 of Article VI of the Agreement, shall serve as Director-General of the WTO". Accordingly, Mr. Sutherland served as the first Director-General of the WTO. On 24 March 1995, the WTO General Council agreed to formally appoint Mr. Renato Ruggiero as Director-General of the WTO for one four-year term effective 1 May 1995. The General Council also took note of certain other understandings reached during the consultations leading to this appointment, and authorized the Chairman to undertake consultations at the appropriate time on the development of procedures for the appointment in future of a Director-General.²⁰⁰ On 24 March 1995, Mr. Ruggiero was also appointed by consensus at a Seventh Special Session of the CONTRACTING PARTIES.

B. DEPUTY DIRECTORS-GENERAL

On 15 April 1987 the Council approved the following Procedures for Future Appointment of the Deputy Directors-General:

"The Deputy Directors-General are to be appointed by the Director-General for renewable terms of three years. The Director-General is to announce at a meeting of the Council that he will hold consultations on the appointment or reappointment of a Deputy Director-General. Such consultations will start not less than three months before the expiration of the term of office of the Deputy Director-General. After the termination of the consultations, the Director-General will inform the Council of his decision concerning the appointment".²⁰¹

At the Fifth Special Session in 1993 it was agreed to establish a third Deputy Director-General post.²⁰² On 15 July 1993 the Director-General informed the Council that he had decided to appoint Mr. Anwarul Hoda, Mr. Warren Lavorel and Mr. Jesús Seade as Deputy Directors-General in accordance with these procedures.²⁰³

VIII. PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

Article 90 of the Havana Charter provided, concerning the status of the International Trade Organization in the territory of Members of the ITO:

- "1. The Organization shall enjoy in the territory of each of its Members such legal capacity, privileges and immunities as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions.
- "2. The representatives of Members and the officials of the Organization shall similarly enjoy such privileges and immunities as may be necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organization".

In addition, it provided for the legal capacity of the Organization, as well as these privileges and immunities, to be defined by the General Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies, as supplemented by an annex relating to the International Trade Organization.²⁰⁴ The Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies²⁰⁵ contains provisions regarding juridical personality; property, funds and assets; communications facilities; privileges and immunities for the representatives of members; privileges and immunities of officials; limitations of rights of residence; the United Nations laissez-passer; settlement of disputes; and final provisions. As noted above, the Resolution of the Havana Conference Establishing an Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization mandated the Interim Commission, inter alia, “to prepare, with a view to recommendation by the Economic and Social Council to the first regular session of the Conference, the Annex referred to in paragraph 3 of Article 90 of the Charter”.

During the negotiation of the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation in the Review Session of 1954-1955, complete integration of the OTC and the GATT into the United Nations Organization was considered and rejected (see below). In consequence, Article 10(d) of the OTC Agreement provided that privileges and immunities to be accorded to the OTC, its officials and the representatives of OTC members would be “similar to” those accorded by each OTC member to specialized agencies of the United Nations, to their officials and to the representatives of their members under the Convention on Privileges and Immunities of the Specialized Agencies or under similar arrangements.²⁰⁶

The Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations Organization concluded 11 June 1946 between the Swiss Federal Council and the Secretary-General of the United Nations²⁰⁷, was applied by analogy to the ICITO and its personnel by decision of the Federal Council 20 May 1948.²⁰⁸ This Agreement contains provisions regarding juridical personality of the United Nations Organization; property, funds and assets of the Organization; communications facilities of the Organization; privileges and immunities for the representatives of Members of the Organization; privileges and immunities of officials of the Organization and experts on mission for the Organization; the United Nations laissez-passer; settlement of disputes; and final provisions.

The Swiss authorities decided in 1956 to continue to accord to the ICITO the same status as that from which the European Office of the United Nations benefits under this Agreement. This special juridical status was continued taking into account the assumption that whenever the ITO would be created it would become a specialized agency of the United Nations and would, if it decided to have its headquarters in Switzerland, conclude an agreement with the Federal Council definitively establishing its legal status in Switzerland.²⁰⁹

The federal authorities of Switzerland and the Director-General of GATT, acting in the name of and on behalf of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, agreed on 18 August 1977 to apply to GATT, by analogy, the Agreement on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations Organization concluded 19 April 1946 between the Swiss Federal Council and the Secretary-General of the United Nations. This agreement had been approved by the Council of Representatives at its meeting on 26 July 1977.²¹⁰

By virtue of the relationship between ICITO and the United Nations, ICITO personnel on mission outside the territory of Switzerland have been accorded the privileges and immunities of personnel of the United Nations, and travel under United Nations laissez-passer.

²⁰⁴This provision originated in a suggestion by the Secretariat to the Havana Conference based on a Resolution of the United Nations General Assembly. E.CONF.2/C.6/12 p. 15-16; see also text of letter from United Nations Secretary-General and text of General Convention in E/CONF.2.C.6/16.

IX. RELATIONSHIP WITH OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

A. UNITED NATIONS

Paragraph 1 of Article 86 of the ITO Charter would have required that the ITO be brought into relationship with the United Nations through a specialized agency agreement with the Economic and Social Council under Article 63 of the United Nations Charter. The Executive Committee of ICITO prepared and approved a specialized agency agreement for the ITO, but the ITO never entered into force.²¹¹

In their Fifth and Sixth Sessions in 1950 and 1951, when it had become apparent that ratification of the ITO Charter would be indefinitely postponed, the CONTRACTING PARTIES discussed the arrangements for continuing administration of the General Agreement. It was proposed that secretariat and conference services be provided by the United Nations and that the Secretariat staff be administratively under the control of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. Contracting parties which were not UN members would make separate contributions to the United Nations. In discussions of this proposal, the concerns were expressed that financial contributions to the work of the CONTRACTING PARTIES would be made by non-contracting parties; that the CONTRACTING PARTIES would lose their independence; and that an dissatisfied individual contracting party could appeal to the Economic and Social Council, with the result that discussions in the CONTRACTING PARTIES would be duplicated in ECOSOC. The Chairman noted that all representatives that had spoken, other than that of its sponsor, had expressed doubts about the proposal.²¹²

As a result of the discussion, the CONTRACTING PARTIES instructed the Executive Secretary to consult with the Secretary-General of the United Nations in 1952 concerning arrangements with the UN. These consultations resulted in an exchange of letters in August 1952 in which the Secretary-General was notified of the nature of the arrangement between ICITO and the CONTRACTING PARTIES, and confirmed therein that “the existence of this arrangement, coupled with the close working arrangements which exist between the United Nations Secretariat and the Secretariat of the Interim Commission renders it unnecessary to make separate or formal agreements relating to the work of the General Agreement”.²¹³ This exchange has defined the relationship between the CONTRACTING PARTIES and the United Nations, in which the GATT is treated as a specialized agency on a de facto basis. The GATT has not concluded a specialized agency agreement with the United Nations, nor has it been brought into any other formal relationship with the United Nations. It has however been the policy of the CONTRACTING PARTIES “to avoid passing judgment in any way on essentially political matters and to follow decisions of the United Nations on such questions”.²¹⁴

The issue of relations with the United Nations was considered during the drafting of the Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation in the Review Session of 1954-55. The Secretary-General of the United Nations had informally put forward the view that a closer relationship than specialized agency status was desirable; “he hoped that the possibility of complete integration into the United Nations as a subordinate body would be carefully considered by the CONTRACTING PARTIES”.²¹⁵ The Executive Secretary of the CONTRACTING PARTIES stated concerning specialized agency status that “The Agreement is a treaty embodying specific rights and obligations on the parties to it in the field of commercial policy. In this respect it differs from those specialized agencies, which operate under Charters providing for general co-operation and co-ordination in various fields but without creating treaty rights and obligations such as those provided for in GATT. If it could be argued that the effect of specialized agency status would in any way subject the decisions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES to appeal, or even to the influence of an external body, then it would be necessary carefully to consider entering into such status”.²¹⁶ The report of the group which considered this issue indicates that it “felt unable to share these views of the Secretary-General, and in the light of them felt, indeed, that the CONTRACTING PARTIES might wish to adopt a somewhat more cautious attitude to the suggestion that the Organization aim at a specialized agency relationship".²¹⁷ Accordingly, the Agreement on the OTC permitted, but did not require, conclusion of a specialized agency agreement with the United Nations.²¹⁸ This Agreement never entered into effect.

As a result, arrangements of a practical nature have developed over the years covering exchange of information and documents, resolutions of the United Nations, reciprocal representation and coordination. The Secretary-General of the United Nations or his representative is invited to attend sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES, the Council and regular GATT committees and working parties; the Director-General of GATT or his representative is invited to attend plenary meetings of the General Assembly, its committees, and meetings of the Economic and Social Council and, as appropriate, its subsidiary bodies. As regards the Economic and Social Council the question of GATT participation under the new rules of procedure of the Council was discussed during the fifty-ninth session of the Council in July 1975. It was agreed that GATT should continue to participate on the same footing as before.²¹⁹ The same arrangements also apply to the Regional Economic Commissions. The GATT participates in the work of the Administrative Committee on Coordination, and in bodies established by it such as the Consultative Committee on Administrative Questions (CCAQ). It also participates in the work and shares in the costs of the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC). The GATT statistical service cooperates with the United Nations Statistical Services and shares in the costs of the International Computing Centre.

The 1976 Report of the Consultative Group of Eighteen notes that the Group had "discussed developments in, and secretariat action with respect to, various United Nations bodies, such as the Task Force on the Implementation of General Assembly Resolution 3362 and the Ad Hoc Committee on Restructuring of the Economic and Social Sectors of the United Nations System ... In the light of these discussions, the Group confirmed the general approach adopted by the Director-General in relation to the activities of these various bodies, and also endorsed his comprehensive statement to the Ad Hoc Committee which stressed the distinctive contractual nature of the GATT and the important implications this had both for relations between contracting parties and between the GATT and other international institutions".²²⁰

B. INTERGOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

Paragraph 1 of Article 87 of the Havana Charter mandated the ITO to make arrangements for effective co-operation and the avoidance of unnecessary duplication in the activities of intergovernmental organizations; paragraph 3 of that Article authorized the Director-General of the ITO to make an agreement to bring such an organization under the ITO whenever deemed desirable by the Conference and the competent authorities of any such organization whose purposes and functions lay within the scope of the Charter.²²¹

Although Article XV of the General Agreement provides for a special role for the International Monetary Fund in the administration of the balance-of-payments provisions of the General Agreement, the CONTRACTING PARTIES have never entered into a formal agreement with the Fund. Concerning institutional relations with the IMF, see Article XV.

C. NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

Paragraph 2 of Article 87 of the Havana Charter authorized the ITO to make suitable arrangements for consultation and co-operation with non-governmental organizations concerned with matters within the scope of the Charter.²²²

The Rules of Procedure for Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES have not provided for observer status for non-governmental organizations.²²³ In connection with the Working Party set up in the sixth session to examine resolutions of the International Chamber of Commerce on certain customs facilitation matters, it was decided that if no action were taken in the absence of rules pertaining thereto, the Working Party could ask the International Chamber of Commerce to give evidence if they should consider this desirable. The Report of the ensuing Working Party notes that "The working party decided to invite the International Chamber of Commerce to send representatives to one meeting of the working party to make a statement regarding the contents of these three resolutions and to answer questions on points which, after a preliminary examination by the working party, might require clarification".²²⁴ A Note of 15 June 1990 by the Secretariat on "Observer Status in GATT" states as follows: "International non-governmental organizations (NGOs) do not have 'consultative status' in GATT: none have been admitted as observers at sessions".²²⁵ See also the discussion of observer status above at page 1095.

A. PREPARATORY WORK AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE ORGANIZATION

Concerning the institutional aspects of the International Trade Organization, the relevant articles in the U.S. Suggested Charter are Articles 50 through 77: in the London Draft Charter Articles 61 to 85 and 87, in the New York Draft Charter Articles 61 to 84 and 87, in the Geneva Draft Charter Articles 68 to 88, and in the Havana Charter Articles 71 to 91. See also discussions in the Second, Third, Fifth and Sixth Sessions of the CONTRACTING PARTIES on continuing administration of the General Agreement.

B. REVIEW SESSION AND ORGANIZATION FOR TRADE COOPERATION

The Review Session of 1954-55 gave extensive consideration to the organizational aspects of the GATT and proposed a Protocol of Organizational Amendments to the GATT, including an Agreement on the Organization for Trade Cooperation. Further information can be found in the report of the Review Working Party on Organizational and Functional Questions and associated documents.²²⁶

C. SUCCESSION TO CONTRACTING PARTY STATUS UNDER ARTICLE XXVI:5(c)

The simplified procedures for the acquisition of contracting party status under Article XXVI:5(c) adopted in 1963 provide for a certification by the Director-General to the effect that the conditions of Article XXVI:5(c) have been fulfilled and advising that the government concerned has become a contracting party. The rights and obligations of contracting parties acceding under Article XXVI:5(c) date from the date of independence of the newly-independent State or the date of a territory's autonomy in the conduct of its external commercial relations as certified by the "responsible contracting party" under Article XXVI:5(c). See further at pages 853-856.

VII. ACCEPTANCES OF TOKYO ROUND AGREEMENTS

Status as of 1 June 1995. The table below refers to the following agreements, all done at Geneva on 12 April 1979 unless otherwise specified, which are open for acceptance by governments contracting parties to the GATT and by the European Economic Community.¹

1. Agreements which entered into force on 1 January 1980:

- (ADP) Agreement on Implementation of Article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, 26S/171, 1186 UNTS 2. Acceptance of this Agreement carries denunciation of the Agreement on Implementation of Article VI of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade done in 1967 (all parties to the 1967 Agreement have accepted the 1979 Agreement except Portugal and Malta).
- (SCM) Agreement on Interpretation and Application of Articles VI, XVI and XXIII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, 26S/56, 1186 UNTS 204.
- (LIC) Agreement on Import Licensing Procedures, 26S/154, 1186 UNTS 372.
- (AIR) Agreement on Trade in Civil Aircraft, 26S/162, 1186 UNTS 170; the Annex to this Agreement was amended by the Protocol (1986) Amending the Annex to the Agreement on Trade in Civil Aircraft, 34S/22, ... UNTS ..., which entered into force on 1 January 1988.
- (TBT) Agreement on Technical Barriers to Trade, 26S/8, 1186 UNTS 276.

2. Agreements which entered into force on 1 January 1981:

- (VAL) Agreement on Implementation of Article VII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, 26S/116, 1235 UNTS 126, and Protocol to the Agreement on Implementation of Article VII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, 26S/151, 1235 UNTS 238, done at Geneva on 1 November 1979; upon entry into force of the Agreement on 1 January 1981, the provisions of the Protocol were deemed to be an integral part of the Agreement.
- (GPR) Agreement on Government Procurement, 26S/33, 1235 UNTS 258; this agreement was amended by the Protocol Amending the Agreement on Government Procurement, 34S/12, ... UNTS ..., which entered into force on 14 February 1988 upon its acceptance by all Parties to the Agreement.

In addition, the following two agreements, done in 1979, were open for acceptance by governments members of the United Nations, or of one of its specialized agencies, and by the European Economic Community. These agreements have now terminated. Information on acceptances of these agreements can be found in previous editions of this book or in the GATT Status of Legal Instruments.

Arrangement Regarding Bovine Meat, 26S/84, 1186 UNTS 344. On 15 April at Marrakesh, Morocco, the International Bovine Meat Agreement was opened for acceptance; Article VI:1(c) of this Agreement provides that acceptance thereof carries denunciation of the Arrangement Regarding Bovine Meat effective on the date of entry into force of the Agreement Establishing the WTO. On 17 June 1994, the International Meat Council composed of the signatories to the Arrangement decided to extend the Arrangement only until the date of entry into force of the Agreement Establishing the WTO and the International Bovine Meat Agreement, and decided that the Arrangement Regarding Bovine Meat would terminate as of that date. The Arrangement duly terminated on 1 January 1995.

International Dairy Arrangement, 26S/91, 1186 UNTS 54. Acceptance of the International Dairy Arrangement carried denunciation of the Arrangement Concerning Certain Dairy Products done in 1970, and the Protocol Relating to Milk Fat, done in 1973. All parties to the 1970 Arrangement and the 1973 Protocol had accepted the 1979 Arrangement or otherwise withdrawn. On 15 April at Marrakesh, Morocco, the International Dairy Agreement was opened for acceptance; Article VIII:1(c) of this Agreement provides that acceptance thereof carries denunciation of the International Dairy Arrangement effective on the date of entry into force of the Agreement Establishing the WTO. In September 1994 the International Dairy Products Council composed of the signatories to the Arrangement decided to extend the Arrangement only until the date of entry into force of the Agreement Establishing the WTO and the International Dairy Agreement, and decided that the International Dairy Arrangement would terminate as of that date. The Arrangement duly terminated on 1 January 1995.

¹Also open for acceptance by governments having provisionally acceded to the GATT, and open to accession by any other government on terms to be agreed between that government and the parties to the agreement in question.

INDEX

The following index covers the body text of this book but not the Appendix tables or the text of the General Agreement itself. References to individual contracting parties have not been indexed except for disputes or material relating to legal determinations regarding application of the General Agreement.

Disputes have been indexed under the name of the contracting party to whose measures the dispute relates, except for the Uruguayan Recourse to Article XXIII, which has been indexed under Uruguay. The headings for cases do not exactly correspond to the official titles used in the Basic Instruments and Selected Documents series and in this book, but have been chosen as a quick reference to the country, measure and product involved. For the purposes of this subject index only, "disputes" include claims brought under Article XXIII:2, disputes that resulted in panel reports, and consultations under Article XXII:2. Separate tables of invocations of Article XXIII, and consultations under Articles XXII:1 and XXII:2 appear in the chapters on Article XXIII and XXII.

The references below to pages in the 1996 printed edition correspond closely, but not exactly, to the pagination of the 2012 online edition, due to anomalies in file format conversion.
